JOINT SESSION OF THE TWO HOUSES.

SIX STATES COUNTED AND THE VOTES ANNOUNCED—THREE SETS OF CERTIFICATES FROM FLORIDA — OBJECTIONS FROM BOTH SIDES—THE PAPERS REFERRED TO THE ELECTORAL COLLEGE COMMISSION FOR JUDGMENT—RECESS TILL 10 A. M. TO-DAY TAKEN.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 1.—The two houses met together at 1 o'clock, as required by law, to begin the counting of the Electoral votes. The galleries of the hall of the House were already filled, and the available space on the floor was occupied by privileged persons. Of course, there was a great desire to witness a fair count, and curiosity was increased by the expectation that the new law would afford some new diversion to the formality of the counting, for, strange as it may seem, after all that has been written about this law, not one person in 10 is met who has more than a remote and glimmering idea of the manner of its execution. To gratify the common curiosity thousands of people labored anxiously last night and this morning to secure the tickets of admission, and the few hundred who were fortunate enough to obtain them had taken possession of most of the choice seats in the galleries two hours before the beginning of the count. Holders of tickets found policemen guarding all the entrances to the House wing of the Capitol, and when once they passed within the cordon the precautions taken had secured them against the annoyance of crowds, for no more were admitted than could obtain places to see the proceedings of the day. The gallery behind the clock, where the colored admirers of Congress used to sleep during the dull sessions and laugh during the funny ones, was for once filled with finely-dressed gentlemen and ladies. The crowd were rewarded for their early possession of seats, first by an hour of waiting, and then an hour of the session of the House which was mostly spent in reading the record of last night's session, even to the lists of yeas and nays and the absentees. At 12:45 a recess of 10 minutes was taken.

Just before the recess there was an incident of some significance, and deserving particular attention. Speaker Randall announced the two tellers on the part of the House to be Gen. Cook, of Georgia, and Mr. Stone, of Missouri. Both are Southern Democrats of much muscle and plenty of pluck, but not heretofore renowned for their abilities in counting. Mr. Kasson called attention to the fact that it was unusual for the minority to be deprived of representation in so important a function, and Mr. Randall explained that his intention had been communicated to the President of the Senate, who would look after the interests of his party by appointing two Republican Senators as tellers. Mr. Kasson mildly remarked that it should go on record that such action by the President of the Senate was caused by the action of the Speaker of the House, at which there were demonstrations of displeasure on the Democratic side. There has been some private byplay in regard to this affair for two or three days, and Mr. Randall has been besought by Democratic Senators to appoint one Democrat and one Republican, as was intended in the Senate, and in accordance with the spirit of the law for which the vote of Randall was greeted with applause when the bill passed the House. Mr. Randall was inflexible, and it seems for a purpose. There was a plan a while ago for the tellers of the House to count Tilden in, whatever might be the count of the Senate tellers, and so to report to the House. That the report might be unanimous, it was necessary that no Republican teller should be appointed. Mr. Randall cannot get over the notion that some contingency may arise under the new law in which that game might be played, and hence he has displayed what appears to most people to be a piece of petty partisanship, but what really has a deeper meaning.

At 12:55 Mr. Sympson, a clerk from the Senate, announced the appointment of Senators Allison and Sargent as tellers, but presently came back and said that Mr. Sargent had been excused and Senator Ingalls appointed in his place. This message was almost immediately followed by the Senators, walking two by two, preceded by the Sergeants at Arms of both houses. The House rose to receive the Senate, and the latter were soon seated in the seats reserved for them in the front rows on the Democratic side. In a few moments perfect order and quiet reigned in the House, while Vice President Ferry, occupying the Speaker's chair, prepared to open the Electoral returns. The House at this moment was densely filled in every corner, both on the floor and in the galleries, about 1,800 persons, probably, being within hearing of Mr. Ferry's voice. There were a great many people from out of town present, and a number of distinguished men were on the floor. Of the latter were George Bancroft, the historian; Secretary Robeson, Justices Field, and Miller, of the Supreme Court, also members of the Electoral Commission; Gen. Sherman, with Don Cameron, Secretary of War, Secretary Chandler, the counsel for both parties—Mr. Evarts, Mr. Stoughton, Mr. Shellabarger, and Stanley Matthews, for the Republicans; Mr. Trumbull, Mr. Merrick, Mr. Black, and Charles O'Conor, for the Democrats.

Mr. Ferry had the returns in a wooden box, a little more than one foot in dimensions. He announced in the usual formal manner that the two houses were met to be present at the opening of the certificates and the counting of votes for President and Vice President for four years from the 4th of next March. Then he opened the box, and, taking out the return from Alabama, broke the seal and handed the papers to Senator Allison, one of the tellers, to read. The tellers occupied the desk of the Reading and Journal Clerks immediately in front of the desk. The paper proved to be rather long, and 15 minutes was taken in the reading. The return received by the messenger having been read, the duplicate received by mail was handed to Mr. Stone and was read through by him. This double reading was afterward discontinued, the duplicate return being compared in each case with the return which was read. The reading of these formal papers in extenso was, of course, tiresome to everybody, but the law requires it. The presiding officers inquired if any objections were offered to counting the vote of Alabama as reported, and none being offered the 10 votes of Alabama were ordered to be counted for Tilden and Hendricks.

The second returns opened were from Arkansas. They were read by the tellers, and the six votes were counted for Tilden and Hendricks. California and Colorado followed, and were rapidly disposed of, the six votes of the former and the three votes of the latter being counted for Hayes and Wheeler. The 6 votes of Connecticut and the 3 votes of Delaware were counted for Tilden and Hendricks. The reading of the papers occupied considerable time, but everything was found to be in order. The next certificate opened was from Florida. The reading of the papers in the case of this State, which everybody had been waiting for, was the most tedious and wearisome of all, though interesting to those who were about to consider them in another tribunal. First, Mr. Ferry opened and the tellers read the regular and lawful return from the State, which was seen to comply with the law in every particular and with complete exactness. This return, of course, gave four votes for Hayes and Wheeler. Mr. Ferry next produced and opened a second return, which proved to be the pretended vote of the Tilden Electors, which was certified to by the Secretary of State. This return was gravely and solemnly regular, except the absence of the proper executive certificate. This return having been read, a third return was opened, which was received only yesterday. This set of papers is the result of the new count by the order of the Legislature. The papers were printed and everything done with elegance, the broad, gilt seals shining upon every corner. There was attached to the paper a broadside of election returns which would have required an hour or more to read. The reading, except a little of the first part, was dispensed with by unanimous consent. Then followed the presentation of objections. Mr. David Dudley Field presented a long written objection to the counting of the Hayes return. This was signed by five Senators and five Representatives, among them being Senators Jones, of Florida, and McDonald, and Representatives Field, Jenks, and Springer. Senator Jones, on his own behalf, objected to counting the vote of Humphreys, a Republican Elector, alleging that he was a Federal office holder, and ineligible. Objections were made on the Republican side to counting the pretended votes for Tilden and Hendricks. The papers were brief, setting forth in few words the reasons well known to everybody why neither the second nor the third set of returns should be counted. Senators Sargent, Conover, and Sherman, and Representatives Kasson and McCrary were the signers of the objection, and the papers were presented by Senator Sargent and Mr. Kasson. All papers and returns, including great bundles of testimony taken by the Florida Investigating Committees, were then ordered sent to the Electoral Commission, and the two houses separated, each going on with its own usual business.

The Electoral Commission was assembled in the Supreme Court room at 2 o'clock, awaiting any papers that might be sent to them. The returns were not sent till after 3 o'clock, and the Commission adjourned till 10:30 to-morrow morning, having first arranged the order of hearing arguments, which will consume eight hours, and extend into and through Saturday, deferring the decision of the Florida case till next week.

THE ELECTORAL COMMISSION.

FIRST SESSION FOR ACTUAL BUSINESS OF THE BOARD—THE FLORIDA OBJECTIONS CERTIFIED BY THE PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE — ARRANGEMENTS FOR THE HEARING OF ARGUMENT.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 1.—The Commission was half through its session before any reporters were able to obtain admittance, the arrangements for their accommodation not having been very well looked after. They were at last admitted into the old gallery, directly over the bench and desks of the Supreme Judges. The auditorium of the court-room had no more than a dozen or two spectators, and the tables for lawyers within the bar were not so well filled as on usual court days. The 15 Commissioners sat in a row, 11 of them behind the long desk of the court, and two at each end at tables placed for their use at right angles with the Judges' bench. The five Justices occupied the middle seats, the members from the Senate being on their right, and the members from the House on the left. Beginning at the extreme left of the bench, to one entering the main door of the court-room, the order in which the Commission sits is as follows: Senators Thurman, Bayard, Frelinghuysen, Morton, Edmunds; Justices Strong, Miller, Clifford, Field, Bradley, and Representatives Payne, Hunton, Abbott, Garfield, and Hoar. In front of the Commission are two rows of tables within the bar. On the right of the President of the Commission is the table of the Democratic counsel, and directly before the President is the table of the Democratic objectors. Behind this table is that of the Republican counsel, and to the extreme left of the Commission, at the second row of tables, are the Republican objectors. To-day these tables were occupied by gentlemen whose names have been heretofore mentioned as counsel and objectors on either side. It has been determined that Messrs. Thompson and Jenks will speak for the Democratic objectors, and Messrs. Kasson and McCrary for the Republicans. The order of speeches is not fixed, certainly, nor is it determined what counsel will address the Commission, and in what order the addresses will be made. To-day, David Dudley Field seemed to take charge of the Democratic case, and Senator Sargent was the principal spokesman for the Republicans. The Commission ordered the printing of the certificates and objections, and Representative Abbott endeavored to secure the printing of all papers, which motion was withdrawn on the objection of Mr. Edmunds that it might involve a determination of how far the Commission would go in the case.

A DIFFICULTY TO BE OVERCOME.

THE CONTINUOUS SESSION REQUIRED BY THE ELECTORAL ACT—A MODIFICATION IN THE LAW TO BE MADE.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 1.—Speaker Randall and President pro tem. Ferry had a conference this afternoon in regard to the embarrassments likely to result from the provision of the Electoral act which prohibits a dissolution of the joint meeting of the two houses "until the count of the Electoral votes shall be completed and the result declared." This provision of the act is closely followed by others which authorize either house to take a recess from the afternoon of one day until an hour not later than 10 o'clock next morning in the event of questions having arisen in regard to the counting of any Electoral votes, and also to proceed with its ordinary business while any question is being considered by the Commission. The effect of the first described provision will be, however, to keep both houses technically in continuous session, so that all proceedings in either one of them, until the completion of the count, must bear the date of to-day. This will greatly impede legislative business, as, under the rules, a single objection is sufficient in many cases to prevent the consideration of certain classes of business until the next legislative day after it is presented. Difficulties might also arise concerning bills sent to the President for his approval, pending the completion of the count, as they would all bear the legislative date of to-day. The Speaker and Mr. Wilson, of Iowa, who is also a member of the House Committee on Rules, called on Mr. Ferry as soon as the House took its recess, and he invited Senators Blaine, Hamlin, and Conkling to participate in the conference on this subject, as the result of which it was agreed to be necessary to repeal immediately so much of the Electoral act as prohibits adjournments from day to day while questions remain under consideration by the Commission. Mr. Wilson will to-morrow offer a bill in the House for this purpose, and it will doubtless be promptly passed by both bodies. The subject was also discussed informally in the executive session of the Senate this afternoon.

THE INELIGIBLE ELECTORS.

REPORT OF THE SENATE COMMITTEE ON ELECTIONS—FROST OF MISSOURI, INELIGIBLE, AND THE OTHER MEMBERS OF THE COLLEGE WITHOUT POWER TO FILL THE VACANCY.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 1.—Senator Mitchell, this afternoon, presented the report of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, regarding all the Electors whose eligibility has been contested, except Cronin and his associates in Oregon. Regarding the New-Jersey case, the committee reports that the Elector Williamson was clearly ineligible, but that according to the laws of the State the other Electors, about whom there was no dispute, had the authority to fill his place as they had done. The same report was made regarding the Virginia case. In relation to the Missouri case, on the other hand, the committee held that the Elector Frost was ineligible, and that the other Electors had neither the power to fill his place nor to remove his disabilities. Senator Kernan, representing a minority of the committee, dissented from this part of the report and held that Frost was eligible to the position of Elector, because his political disabilities had been removed by the act of May, 1872. Pending the discussion of this point the Senate went into executive session and then adjourned.

Dispatch to the Associated Press.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 1.—Senator Mitchell, from the Committee on Privileges and Elections, made a report to the Senate to-day under the last clause of the Edmunds resolution, instructing that committee to inquire into the eligibility to office, under the Constitution, of any person alleged to have been ineligible as Presidential Electors on the 7th of November last, to whom certificates of election have been issued by the Executive authority of any State. The report covers three cases of alleged ineligible Electors: First, that of Benjamin Williamson, of New-Jersey; second, that of Gen. D. M. Frost, of Missouri; and third, that of F. W. M. Halliday, of Virginia.

In the case of the New-Jersey Elector, the committee find that Mr. Williamson was about 25 years ago appointed by the Circuit Court of the United States a United States Commissioner, and that he never resigned the office. The committee find, therefore, that said Williamson was ineligible as an Elector on the 7th of November last. Mr. Williamson resigned and did not attend the meeting of the Electoral College, and his vacancy was filled by the Electors present. The committee find that under the statute of New-Jersey the Electors could legally fill such vacancy.

In the case of Daniel M. Frost, of Missouri, the committee find that prior to the rebellion he was an officer in the United States Army; had taken the oath required; also that he had been a member of the Missouri Legislature prior to that time, and as such had taken an oath to support the Constitution of the United States; also that he was an officer of the Confederate Army. The committee further find that these facts render him ineligible to the Electorate under the third section of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution. The committee also find that Mr. Frost received a pardon from the President of the United States on the 28th of October, 1865. The committee also find, as a conclusion of law, that this pardon did not affect or remove the disability as imposed by the fourteenth amendment, the report holding that the disability could only be removed by the two-thirds vote of both houses of Congress. They also find as a matter of fact that Mr. Frost did not attend the meeting of the Missouri Electoral College, and that the alleged vacancy was filled, or attempted to be filled, by the Electors present. The committee find, as a conclusion of law, that under the statute of the State of Missouri the Electors present had no power whatever to fill the vacancy occasioned by the absence of Frost, and that their action in attempting to do so was void. The committee find that, inasmuch as Frost was ineligible to be an Elector, he was also ineligible to be appointed.

In the case of Holliday, of Virginia, the committee find that he was a Centennial Commissioner at the time of the election; that such office is one of trust under the Constitution of the United States, and he was, therefore, ineligible to be an Elector. Mr. Holliday did not attend the meeting of the Electoral College, and those present filled the vacancy, which the committee find they could legally do under the statutes of Virginia.

The committee further find that should the doctrine assumed by Gov. Grover, of Oregon, be conceded—which the committee report as indefensible in either law or morals—then Mr. Stifel, the Republican candidate in opposition to Mr. Frost in Missouri, and the Republican candidate in opposition to Mr. Holliday, were each entitled to receive the certificate of the Governor, and each entitled to act as Presidential Elector.

This report does not cover the Oregon case, as the investigation in that case is under a special resolution of the Senate. The report in that case will be made in a few days.

Dr. J. W. Watts, the alleged ineligible Elector from Oregon, was recalled before the Senate Committee on Privileges and Elections this morning, and testified that he had not been a Postmaster since the 14th day of November last, when he telegraphed his resignation to the Postmaster General. Postmaster General Tyner was called, and corroborated the testimony of Dr. Watts.

NOTES FROM THE CAPITAL.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 1.—The new Board of Police Commissioners to-day reinstated Major Richards, the Superintendent of Police, and also the detectives who had also been suspended.

Hon. Alexander H. Stephens' condition continues to improve. At no time have his physicans dispaired of his recovery. His disease is not pulmonary, but pneumonic and neuralgic.

LOUISIANA POLITICS.

NEW-ORLEANS, Feb. 1.—The Superior Criminal Court to-day served a written order upon Secretary of State Emile Honore, at the State-house, requiring him to deliver for investigation by the Grand Jury the original returns of the late election, now in his keeping. Mr. Honore replied that the records of his office show that neither W. R. Whitaker, the Judge issuing this order, nor John J. Finney, the District Attorney, on whose motion it was made, have been commissioned or qualified according to law. He, therefore, refuses to recognize them, and says he regards the issuance of such an order, and any attempt to enforce it, as a violation of the statu quo, and will lay the facts before Gov. Packard for his action.

The Democratic lawyers claim that Packard has recognized the Nicholls Government by filing an answer to a suit against him in the Sixth District Court. The Republican Legislature passed a bill abolishing this court, and the holding-over and re-elected Judge (Soucier) died. Gov. Nicholls appointed the present incumbent Judge Register, before whom the suit was brought, and whose judicial existence Packard admitted by pleading before it.

NICKEL COUNTERFEITERS ARRESTED.

NEW-ORLEANS, Feb. 1.—Francisco Pontillo and wife, Martin J. Scotti, Virgil Gorsain, and Salvador Albernini, were arrested by Treasury Detective Steele to-day, charged with making and issuing counterfeit nickels. A large quantity of counterfeit nickels, dies, &c., were captured

LATEST NEWS BY CABLE.

THE EASTERN CONFLICT.

NEGOTIATIONS BETWEEN THE PORTE, SERVIA, AND MONTENEGRO—WARLIKE PREPARATIONS IN ROUMANIA—THE RUSSIAN GUARDS TO BE MOBILIZED.

LONDON, Feb. 1.—A dispatch to Reuter's Telegraph Company from Constantinople says: "It is believed that the Porte, in its negotiations with Servia, is disposed to require as a guarantee the continued Turkish occupation of Alexinatz, Montenegro, in reply to Midhat Pasha's dispatch to treat direct for peace, accepts the proposal to negotiate, and requests the Porte to state the conditions it will accord as a basis of negotiation."

LONDON, Feb. 2.—The Standard's special from Bucharest announces that the Roumanian Chambers have reduced the budget of the War Office to $2,800,000.

The Times' dispatch from Berlin says Servia is willing to raze the fortifications at Deligrad and Alexinatz if Turkey leaves the other fortresses in her hands. The Roumanians are erecting batteries opposite the Turkish redoubts at Widdin. It is understood that the mobilization of the Russian Guards has been resolved upon.

A Times telegram from Belgrade reports that Servia is waiting for replies to her appeal to the Western powers to interfere in her behalf for the purpose of arranging terms with the Porte which shall be satisfactory to both Governments and not contain stipulations for guarantees so repugnant to both Servia and Montenegro. It is probable the Skupochtigna will meet, notwithstanding the Cabinet's opposition, to decide upon the ratification of the treaty if one is negotiated. It is certain that there will be a Conservative Ministry as soon as peace is concluded.

The Vienna correspondent of the Times telegraphs that Constant Effendi has been instructed to proceed immediately to Cettinje to open negotiations. Montenegro is aware that the Porte, although anxious to make peace with Servia, is comparatively indifferent as regards Montenegro, because the latter's geographical position precludes effective co-operation on her part with Russia. Montenegro is, therefore, laying great stress upon the agreement by which the Principalities promised not to act independently of each other. The Prince has sent most positive assurances to Belgrade that he will only act in union with Servia, as he sees that by solidarity with Servia he will be able to extract much better conditions from the Porte. Midhat Pasha introduced the stipulation for guarantees as a concession to the Turkish party, which objected to the Porte's making overtures to a defeated enemy. It is thought he will either drop the stipulation or reduce it to an inoffensive minimum. As soon as it was known that Turkey had made overtures to Servia the Russian representatives at various courts declared that Russia had no objection to the conclusion of peace. It is curious that these representatives do not seem to have orders to make a similar declaration with regard to Montenegro.

The Times publishes a letter from Lord Stratford de Redcliffe, recommending that the powers give the reforms established by Turkey a fair trial. It suggests that the mediating powers might conclude an agreement to this effect and make official declaration to the Porte that they are not only agreed, but vigilant and determined, and only for a reasonable time forbearing.

The Paris correspondent of the Times says it is affirmed on all hands that a brisk correspondence is progressing between Russia and Germany. Some assert that Russia wants to know whether she could enjoy the fruits of victory if she achieves one. It is certain that Turkey quite comprehended the danger of a prolongation of the present state of affairs. A direct satisfaction which might be offered to Russia is therefore being sincerely sought, such as would allay public excitement, and justify disarmament by both Russia and Turkey.

Gen. Tchernayeff has arrived at Ventnor, Isle of Wight.

LONDON, Feb. 2.—A dispatch from Madrid to the Standard states that negotiations have commenced between Spain and the United States for a revision of the Treaty of 1795, so that in future citizens of either country when in the other can be judged only by the civil courts, even in Cuba, unless taken in armed rebellion.

The Standard's Madrid dispatch reports that the conscription is progressing in the Basque Provinces. The people in the rural districts comply readily, but Gen. Quesada is obliged to enforce obedience by fines in the towns.

The Journal de St. Petersbourg reports that the Khan of Khiva has applied for the formal complete incorporation of his territory into the Russian Empire.

PAUL, Feb. 1.—A young woman named Julia Stockfield, confined in the county jail at La Crosse, committed suicide last evening by setting her clothes on fire with a live coal taken from the stove in the woman's department. When first discovered the poor woman was wholly enveloped in flames, which were soon extinguished, but not until her clothes were almost entirely burned from her body. She died a few hours later.

THE OPEN POLAR SEA.

LETTER FROM ADMIRAL PORTER TO CAPT. HOWGATE—HIS THEORY OF THE ICEBERG OBSTRUCTIONS IN ROBESON'S CHANNEL—THE COLONY SYSTEM APPROVED BY HIM.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 1.—Admiral Porter has just written a letter to Capt. Howgate regarding his proposed expedition. In it he says: "In my opinion, there is an open sea for 200 miles toward the Pole; that there are high mountains, from which are precipitated the icebergs which lately blocked up Robeson's Channel, and that, had Markham's furthest point been exceeded by 60 miles, the pack would have been passed and open water reached again. Every few years we must expect just such a pack as Capt. Nares encountered, which will probably last for a year or two, and will then break up. If, at the moment of breaking up, men and boats are in readiness to take advantage of the opportunity, a great advance could be made toward the Pole. There are no greater hardships to be encountered as high as 83° than have heretofore been surmounted by the intrepid explorers of the Arctic regions, and when one reflects that a party from the Polaris drifted 1,800 miles on a cake of ice, and that an infant and its mother were all that time exposed to the inclemencies of the Arctic regions, we ought to have no doubt about a company of strong, active men, well provided with everything necessary to make life endurable in that desolate region."

The letter continues in substance that the greatest difficulty will be found in keeping up the spirits of the men. To do this the Admiral suggests that each member of the crew selected shall have a knowledge of some useful mechanical trade, and that he be kept occupied at this when in Winter quarters. "In the event of such an expedition as you propose," the letter continues, "I see a fine opportunity of utilizing the electric telegraph. Wires could be laid along on the ground or ice without much dangor of their being carried off by bears or foxes." In conclusion the Admiral states that he can see no objection to the proposed expedition, and hopes it may succeed.

A TOBACCO DECISION.

REMOVAL OF TOBACCO FOR SAMPLES OR BY EMPLOYES PROHIBITED—THE LATTER TO BE PUNISHED IF DISCOVERED.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 1.—The Commissioner of Internal Revenue has addressed a circular to Collectors in regard to the manufacture of tobacco, snuff, and cigars, in which he says: "In making explanations to this office of apparent deficiencies in the accounts of the transactions of tobacco and cigar manufacturers, the allegation is not unfrequently made that discrepancies both in material accounts and in the disposition made of manufactured products are owing largely to two causes: First—The tobacco and cigars which are given away by the manufacturer as samples, and which do not appear in his account of sales. Second—The quantity of manufactured product, and oftentimes of raw material, which is used or consumed or removed for use or consumption by operatives without the knowledge or consent of the manufacturer. The first of these causes is entirely within the control of the manufacturer. He has no more right to remove manufactured tobacco or cigars for samples from the place of manufacture, or to allow them to be so removed, without properly packing and stamping the same, and reporting such removals, than he has to sell or remove them for sale or consumption without a compliance with the law in this regard; and not only will no credit be given to the manufacturer for goods so removed, but all such goods will be regarded as removed in violation of that portion of the law which prohibits the removal of tobacco and cigars without the payment of the tax thereon. It may not be so easy for the manufacturer to control removals of the second class. He is, nevertheless, responsible to the Government, not only for the disposition made of manufactured goods, but also for the disposition of the materials which are charged to him. He should, therefore, in most positive terms, forbid all his employes from using or removing any such goods or materials, and in case he detects an employe defrauding the Government in this manner, it becomes his duty to report such offender to the officers of the revenue to be dealt with according to the nature of the offense. Especially should he take the precaution thus to protect the interests of the Government before making claims upon this office to settle his accounts for deficiencies which may have grown out of such unlawful acts of the employes under his control."

MARINE DISASTERS.

BATH, Me., Feb. 1.—A dispatch from London received here to-day announces the wrecking on the English coast of the ship John H. Kimball, Capt. D. M. Humphries. E. Getchlish, Acting Collector of this port. The Delphin was got afloat by Cobb Brothers, wreckers. The cargo is insured for $6,000 in Baltimore, and the vessel is also insured for $6,000. The vessel is slightly damaged.

The Government steamer Newfield arrived at Whitehaven, N. S., last night from Sable Island. She reports that no wrecks have occurred there since her last visit. The Newfield towed into Whitehaven the brig Priscilla May, previously abandoned in the ice in the Straits of Canso.

CAPTURE OF DESPERADOES.

ST. LOUIS, Feb. 1.—Information from Williamson County, Ill., which has been the scene of numerous murders and attempted assassinations of late years, is to the effect that a band of desperadoes organized for the purposes of robbery and murder, if necessary to carry out their plans, has been discovered during the past week, and James Moss, the leader, and James Jackson, Frank Palmer, and another have been arrested and lodged in jail. These men will, no doubt, be indicted by the Grand Jury, which is now in session, and every effort made to bring the whole gang to justice.

ARREST OF TRAIN-WRECKERS.

ST. LOUIS, Feb. 1.—A band of train-wreckers have been operating for some time past on the Missouri, Kansas and Texas Railroad, and several trains have been thrown from the track and robbed. The operations of the band have been in very thinly-settled parts of Southern Kansas and the Indian Territory, and the task of capturing any of them has been exceedingly difficult until Saturday last, when two of them, named Meadows and Mead were arrested by Deputy United States Marshal Stevenson. They were taken to Fort Smith, Ark., where they will be tried.

THE ASHTABULA DISASTER.

OFFICIAL REPORT BY CIVIL ENGINEERS—WEAK POINTS IN THE BRIDGE THAT COULD HAVE BEEN DISCOVERED AND STRENGTHENED.

COLUMBUS, Feb. 1.—B. F. Bowen, Thomas H. Johnson, and John Graham, civil engineers, employed by the Legislative Committee to investigate the Ashtabula Railroad disaster, have submitted a sworn statement of the facts ascertained by them. After referring to their calculations on the relative strength of different parts of the bridge and their observations at the wreck, they submit the following conclusions:

First—That all the tension members had very large factors of safety, and were abundantly able to sustain all strain that could possibly come upon them in this bridge.

Second—That all the compression members, except the counter-braces, were deficient in capacity, having very small factors of safety.

Third—Considered with reference to the location of the break it appears that the weakest point in the braces was at the end near the break, and that the weakest point in the top chord was at the centre through the top chord, and that the point of failure does not show a state of security much greater than that of the braces. The probability is that the braces failed first, and thereby involved the failure of the top chord also, but inasmuch as both members were weak and were involved in the break, it is of little importance which member took precedence in the failure. The factors of safety throughout the compression members were so low that failure must have followed sooner or later at this point.

The engineers proceeded to say how failure might have been prevented at a moderate cost. The remainder of their sworn statement is devoted to a consideration of other defects in the bridge. While these defects were not directly the cause of the failure, they were such as might in themselves have led to failure. They further add that the material, so far as they were able to judge, was of superior quality, and, with few exceptions, the workmanship was very superior. In conclusion, they say that they find nothing in the case to justify the popular apprehension that there may be some inherent defect in iron as a material for bridges. They find no evidence of weakness in this bridge which could not have been discovered and prevented.

THE MEXICAN REVOLUTION.

DIAZ'S GOVERNMENT GENERALLY RECOGNIZED—PROBABILITY THAT IT WILL BE OF SHORT DURATION.

CITY OF MEXICO, Jan. 21.

Armed resistance against Gen. Diaz is considered at an end for the present. Many adherents of President Lerdo continue to leave the country, fearing outrages will be perpetrated upon them. The Church party tacitly countenances Diaz, but is really working to place Conservatives in power. A general opinion prevails that the Diaz Government will be of short duration. Gen. Diaz has ordered the release of a number of foreigners who have been confined in the prisons at Matamoras and Monterey. Information was received here more than a week ago that Lerdo and Iglesias succeeded in leaving the country in safety, but the Government has purposely delayed its publication.

LOSSES BY FIRE.

A fire occurred at 6 o'clock last evening on the top floor of the premises No. 872 Broadway, occupied by Abraham Bogardus as a photograph gallery. Damage to stock and building, $1,500.

The Intercolonial Railroad shops and sheds at Bridgeport, N. S., were burned on Wednesday night. Loss about $25,000; no insurance.

The Dominion Springs Hotel, at Ottawa, Ontario, was burned yesterday. Loss, $15,000; insurance, $7,000.

VERDICT AGAINST A NEWSPAPER.

PITTSBURG, Feb. 1.—The jury in the Moore-Post libel suit to-day returned a verdict of $3,000 damages for the plaintiff. The suit grew out of an article published in the Post during the political campaign in the Fall of 1874. A former trial resulted in a verdict of $10,000 for the plaintiff. The defendants will carry the case to the Supreme Court.

A HOUSE BELONGING TO E. D. WINSLOW.

BOSTON, Feb. 1.—In the Supreme Judicial Court this morning an injunction was granted on the petition of the Boston Five Cent Savings Bank, restraining for one month the sale of a house, valued at $30,000, held, as is alleged, by Susan C. Ayres in trust for Ezra D. Winslow, and upon which the bank has a mortgage.

MURDER BY A CONVICT.

AUBURN, Feb. 1.—Keeper Casler, while engaged with a squad of convicts cleaning the walks in front of the prison this afternoon, was attacked by William Barr, a convict from New-York, known as "Whistling Sam," and horribly mangled about the head, causing instant death. Barr was recently transferred from the Insane Asylum, and is generally supposed to be insane.

FAILURE OF A PORK PACKER.

EAST BUFFALO, Feb. 1.—Frank Weppner, an extensive pork packer, made an assignment last night for the benefit of his creditors. His liabilities are estimated at $50,000, and his assets at from $35,000 to $40,000.

A SON MURDERS HIS MOTHER.

LOUISVILLE, Feb. 1.—In this city this morning Johanna McCarty, aged 65 years, was killed by her son Timothy, aged 19. There was no witness to the deed, nor had any trouble existed prior to its occurrence. When discovered, the woman's head was horribly cut with a hatchet, and the son, who was arrested, gave evidence of insanity.

THE BURNING OF THE MOCTEZUMA.

The Panama Star and Herald of Jan. 21, in announcing the burning of the Cespedes, formerly the Moctezuma, off Cape Gracias a Dios, says Señor Prado was reported to have been burned in her. Three of the crew who had escaped from her previously in a small boat, and had reached Greytown, were brought to Aspinwall by the Moselle.

A letter from Havana, dated Jan. 27, contains the following intelligence: The families of Capt. Cacho, and of the other men killed on board the steamer when captured by the Cubans, have made a reclamation of damages on the Nicaraguan Government, as have also the owners of the cargo on board at the time, on the ground that if the Nicaraguan Government had not given shelter to the Moctezuma she would have fallen, cargo and all on board, into the hands of a Spanish man-of-war. The owner of the steamer, Don Ramon de Herrera, will send one of his other steamers to Cape Gracias a Dios, accompanied by the Spanish gun-boat Jorge Juan, which the Government has put at his disposition for that purpose, in order to raise the hull of the Moctezuma; or, if this should prove impossible, to sink it in deep water.

A PRISONER IN HER EIGHTY-THIRD YEAR.

Recently, at the Bow Street Police Court, London, an old woman named Catharine Jane Owens, in the eighty-third year of her age, was brought before Mr. Vaughan charged with having been found "drunk and incapable" in the public streets. It was stated that she was an inmate of St. Giles' Work-house, and had been allowed a day out to go and visit her friends during the holiday season. The festivity had been too much for her, and she was found dead drunk and helpless on the pavement. Mr. Vaughan—What have you to say to the charge, prisoner? Defendant [to the jailer]—What does the gentleman say? I am a little hard of hearing. It turned out that the old woman was not a little hard of hearing, but as deaf as a post, and the jailer had to repeat the questions. Redstall [the jailer]—The magistrate wants to know what you have to say to the charge of being found drunk and incapable in the streets? Defendant—Lord bless the gentleman, I am over 82 years of age, and can't take as much as I used to do. I works in the laundry at the work-house from 9 o'clock till 5 every day, and sometimes I feels a want of something. I had a holiday yesterday, and I did indulge in a little drop, and I don't know where I got to, but it won't never happen again. Mr. Vaughan—What does she say is her age? Redstall—She is over 82, your Worship, and she says she works in the laundry all day long from 8 or 9 till 5. She seems very active for her age. Mr. Vaughan directed the jailer to advise the old l

Gov. Wells had spoken; the witness did not think that the Governor really wanted so much as $1,000,000; the witness agreed to represent the case.

Jeremiah M. Wilson, counsel for the Returning Board, said he desired that Gov. Wells and Gen. Anderson should be examined as to the matters to which the witness had testified.

The committee then adjourned to attend to their duties in the House, and will meet again to-morrow morning.

MADDOX'S RECORD.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

BALTIMORE, Feb. 1.—Inquiry has been made here to-day in regard to the antecedents of Maddox, the witness before Field's committee, and it turns out that he has figured in several financial schemes of a very disreputable character. He came into notice in 1870 as one of the negotiators of fraudulent stock of the Parkersburg Branch Railroad Company, a road operated by the Baltimore and Ohio. Crawford, Secretary of the company, issued forged certificates of stock to the amount of $500,000, and Maddox appeared to have been one of the accessories employed to obtain loans upon them. Among other loans negotiated by Maddox on these fraudulent certificates was one for $6,000 from Mr. John A. Nichols, President of the Knickerbocker Life Insurance Company. Mr. Nichols came to Baltimore, consulted counsel, and concluded to have Maddox arrested for getting money under false pretenses. Maddox was held to bail in the sum of $10,000 to answer the charge. The Grand Jury investigated the case, but there being no direct proof that Maddox knew the fraudulent character of the certificates when he hypothecated them, the charge was dismissed. Thereupon the valiant Maddox undertook to revenge himself upon the counsel who had advised his arrest, by his friend, John T. Ticketti, the same who is associated with him in the Louisiana matter. He sent a note to John Henry Keene demanding satisfaction. Mr. Keene took no notice of the hostile missive, and refused to hold any communication with either Pickett or Maddox. The latter then published a card declaring Mr. Keene a coward. Mr. Keene responded with a communication in the Gazette, giving the facts that pointed to Maddox as an accessory in the crime committed by Crawford, and Maddox was silenced.

In 1873, Maddox was mixed up in another criminal transaction. He pretended to have a claim against the Government for cotton or tobacco destroyed during the war, and interested with him in its prosecution was Yerger, who murdered Col. Crane in Mississippi. Yerger's wife had a little property, and she was persuaded to mortgage it to raise money to prosecute the claim. Maddox wheedled Yerger out of nearly all the money, giving him bonds redeemable when the claim was paid by the Government. Yerger soon afterward died, and his family are still suffering for want of what Maddox swindled them out of. Those who know Maddox best here say they would not believe him under oath.

THE MASSACHUSETTS PRISON.

ABSURD PLOT OF PRISONERS TO ESCAPE—THE KEEPERS TO BE DRUGGED.

The Boston Journal of Thursday gives the following account of a plot on the part of a dozen prisoners in the Massachusetts State Prison to escape from confinement: "The outline of the scheme for this wholesale prison delivery was gained by Warden Chamberlain a day or two since, and it was allowed to develop far enough to implicate probably all the convicts who were concerned in it, and yesterday they were quietly locked up in solitary confinement. The scheme was doubtless perfected by a noted bank robber, and the principal work was to be executed by a runner in the north wing, in which section most of the convicts concerned in the plot are located. Those who were in the secret, and whose cells are in the other wings, were to commit some misdemeanor, grave enough to secure them a day or two of solitary confinement in the north wing, when the plan was to be put in operation. It is the custom of the guard in this wing to liberate the runner at 5 o'clock in the morning, in order that he may go into the kitchen to assist in preparing breakfast for the convicts. About the first thing prepared is the coffee, and it has been the custom of the wing and octagon men to 'brace up' upon some hot coffee as soon as it was ready. The coffee was to be drugged with morphine by the runner and then taken to the officers as usual, and after the drug had produced the desired effect, either stupefying or killing them outright, their keys were to be taken and the doors of the cells of the conspirators opened. In anticipation of the complete success of this portion of the plan, a jackscrew was prepared with which the bars of the grating which protects the large window of the wing were to be pried apart sufficient to allow the convicts to creep through them, and with a rope ladder also in readiness the wall was to be scaled. The bold and decidedly original scheme was to have been put in execution Monday, and the officers were prepared for their dosed coffee, but as the men in the other wings had not matured their plans in getting out solitary it was postponed. Yesterday morning, however, the schemers were ready and the officers were also, and the deep-laid plot was frustrated. The desperate and defeated conspirators now languish in solitary confinement, and the ball and chain will undoubtedly be the daily companions of the ringleaders for some time to come. From this time forth the officers will most likely take their early morning coffee at their own breakfast tables. The names of the convicts concerned in the plot are withheld, but among them were a number whose names are prominent among the noted bank robbers of New-York."

MARRIAGE OF ACTORS IN MONTREAL.

The Montreal Gazette has the following account of the marriage of Mr. E. A. MacDowell, a theatrical manager, to Miss Fanny Reeves, in that city on Tuesday, Jan. 30: "The popularity of the young gentleman and lady has often been practically demonstrated within the Academy and in other places of a more privately social character, but it was reserved for the thousands assembled yesterday morning as the Church of St. James the Apostle to demonstrate how much interest our citizens are capable of exhibiting to those deserving of it. From an early hour the streets en route were filled with ladies and gentlemen—the fair sex predominating, as was, of course, natural—and long before noon, the hour of the ceremony, the church was filled to overflowing. Several hundreds formed an army of observation on the outside of the church, and several hundreds had come, seen that there was no opportunity of viewing the ceremony with any degree of comfort, and departed sensibly. In the hope of reading all about it in the morning journals. To those who could not find a place in the church it will be interesting to know that none of those who were able to get in had a view of the ceremony with any degree of comfort. So crowded was the body of the church that well-bred people of both sexes, whose feelings under other circumstances would have trowned down such acts, stood upon pews, chairs, and every other available point which afforded an opportunity for a view of the church altar. Some idea of the crush may be imagined when it is stated that a couple of reporters present were squeezed into the pulpit of the church, unable to get out until the ceremony was over. The bridal party having arrived, were seated for some time in the vestry of the church. At about 12.05 o'clock the bride drove to the main entrance in the carriage of Mr. Walker, accompanied by her mother. Notwithstanding the exertions of Sergt. Richardson and a posse of energetic policemen, the bride, leaning on the arm of Mr. Walker, found some difficulty in reaching the interior of the church. Her appearance was the signal for the 'Festal March,' and as the first notes of the organ pealed forth, every one reached upon tip-toe, bent on looking over every other person's head. A few moments afterward Sir Hugh Allan arrived, and in a short time the old, old story was repeated. The ceremony occupied some minutes, and being concluded, all retired to the vestry, where the usual congratulatory compliments were received from many friends, and where also the marriage vows were registered. Sir Hugh Allan gave the bride away, and the bridesmaids were Miss Affie Walker and Miss Isabel Morris, while Mr. F. J. Morris and Mr Charles Arnold were groomsmen. The bride wore a dress of white satin, with bridal veil and orange blossoms, while the bridesmaids were in lavender silk dresses with Watteau plait, with veils and wreaths of cardinal. The Rev. Canon Ellegood was present at the ceremony, and begged the people to be seated are the marriage ceremony commenced. He reckoned without his host, however, as, though a few sat down, a great number did not. The party having completed the registering of their names, the grand wedding march of Mendelssohn was again taken up, and the bridal party again threaded the way through the crowded church to the sleighs and drove rapidly away. Dr. Davis officiated at the organ, and rarely have we heard the position more commendably filled. The streets in the vicinity of the church presented a regular holiday appearance, and for nearly an hour the stream continued to set homeward. At the Ottawa Hotel the reception of the bride and bridegroom was of the most enthusiastic description and was participated in by hundreds of young gentlemen. A band of music was in attendance, and altogether the event was one that will be remembered for many a day. At 5:30 the happy pair departed for Boston and New-York, and will be absent some 10 days."

THE ELECTORAL VOTE.

THE JOINT SESSION OF CONGRESS.

THE VOTES OF SIX STATES COUNTED AND ANNOUNCED—THREE SETS OF CERTIFICATES RECEIVED FROM FLORIDA—OBJECTIONS MADE BY BOTH PARTIES.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 1.—After prayer in the House this morning, Mr. KASSON, of Iowa, called for the reading of the journal of yesterday in full, in order to consume the hour that must elapse before the counting of the Electoral votes, and to prevent a vote being taken on the resolution reported from the special committee on the election in Florida.

The CHAIR appointed as tellers on the part of the House in counting the Electoral votes Messrs. Cook of Georgia, and Stone of Missouri.

Mr. KASSON, of Iowa, called the Chair's attention to the fact that both tellers had been chosen from the majority, and that it was customary in such cases to have a representative of the minority appointed.

The SPEAKER—The gentlemen have been appointed by the Chair under authority of the House, and that fact has been communicated to the President of the Senate, and the Chair understands that he will appoint two of the majority of the Senate.

Mr. KASSON—That will have been done on account of the action of the Speaker.

The SPEAKER—The CHAIR does not feel offended. He has simply done his duty.

Mr. COX, of New-York—Nevertheless it is an insolence.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from Justice Clifford, President of the Electoral Commission, stating that the members thereof had taken the prescribed oath, and that the Commission was ready to perform its duties.

The Senate resolution was agreed to for the publication of the proceedings of the Commission.

Mr. PAYNE, of Ohio, offered a resolution directing the Clerk of the House to inform the Senate that it was ready to receive that body for the purpose of opening and counting the Electoral votes for President and Vice President. Adopted.

The House then took a recess until 12.55 P. M.

During the recess of a quarter of an hour the buzz of conversation on the floor and in the galleries had full scope, but as the dial showed the approach of the hour of 1 P. M., the SPEAKER exerted himself to enforce and to preserve order. The galleries were packed with spectators, but of a more select class than usual, because admission was only obtained by tickets, of which each member and Senator had three at his disposal. Judges Miller and Field, of the Supreme Court, were the first of the Judges who presented themselves. They came in without any formality, and took two of the chairs in the area on the left of the main aisle. At 1.02 o'clock the Speaker announced the arrival of the Senate of the United States, and all the members of the House, at the Speaker's tap, arose and remained standing, while the Senate, preceded by its Clerk, Doorkeeper, and other officials filed down the main aisle and took the seats set apart in the first four rows on the right, or Democratic side of the Chamber. The President of the Senate took the chair, having the Speaker on his left, and then when the Senators and Members were all seated, the President of the Senate rose, and using the gavel to enforce order and silence, said:

"The Joint Convention of the two houses of Congress for counting the votes for President and Vice President will now come to order."

Then while silence reigned in the chamber, the PRESIDENT of the Senate said:

In obedience to the Constitution, the Senate and House of Representatives have met to be present at the opening of the certificates and the counting and declaring of the results of the Electoral votes for the offices of President and Vice President of the United States, for the term of four years commencing on the 4th day of March next.

In compliance with the law, the President of the Senate will now proceed, in the presence of the two Houses, to open all of the certificates of the several States, and in their alphabetical order, beginning with the State of Alabama.

Then the strong box in which the certificates were carried in by Mr. Bassett, the Assistant Doorkeeper of the Senate, having been placed on the desk before him, the President of the Senate opened it, and taking from it the certificate from the State of Alabama, handed it to the tellers who were seated just below him at the Clerk's desk, and Senator Allison, one of the tellers, proceeded to read the document in extenso the result of it all being that Samuel J. Tilden, of New-York, and Thomas A. Headricks, of Indiana, had received the 10 Electoral votes of Alabama.

The VICE PRESIDENT then said that the certificate from Alabama, by messenger, having been read, the duplicate, which had been received by mail would now be read.

Mr. STONE, of Missouri, proceeded to read the duplicate certificate, but the reading was interrupted by Senator CONKLING, of New-York, who suggested that it was hardly necessary to read the duplicate certificate, but that when the first certificate was read by one teller, the other tellers should look over the duplicate in order that the comparision might be made.

The PRESIDENT of the Senate asked whether there was any objection to the proposition, and there being none, he stated that that course would be pursued.

Mr. STONE having then resumed and completed the reading of the duplicate certificate, the presiding officer said:

"Are there any objections to the certificate from the State of Alabama? [After a pause.] The CHAIR hears none. The votes of the State of Alabama will be counted. One of the tellers will announce the votes so there may be no mistake."

The result was announced by Mr. Cook, of Georgia.

The same ceremony was observed in reference to the next State, Arkansas, except that the reading of the duplicate certificate was omitted.

The result was announced that the six votes of the State of Arkansas were given for Tilden and Hendricks.

The next State was California, and the result was announced as six votes for Hayes and Wheeler.

Then followed in succession Colorado, with three votes for Hayes and Waeeler; Connecticut, with six votes for Tilden and Hendricks, and Delaware, with three votes for Tilden and Hendricks.

When the reading of the Delaware certificate was concluded, the presiding officer asked (inadvertently) if there was any objection to counting the votes of the State of Florida, but he immediately corrected himself, and substituted Delaware, amid suppressed but general laughter, because on Florida the first serious conflict was to come.

Then Florida was reached, and Mr. Stone, the teller, proceeded to read the certificate.

The reading of the first certificate showed the four votes of Florida for Hayes and Wheeler. Then the presiding officer called to the teller another certificate received from the same State, which, on being read by Mr. Stone, showed the four votes of Florida for Tilden and Hendricks. The former certificate was authenticated by the late Gov. Stearns; the latter by Attorney General Cooke.

Then the presiding officer handed down to the tellers still another certificate from the State of Florida, received through a messenger on the 31st of January, and a corresponding one received by mail on the 30th of January. This third is an authentication of the act of the Electors who voted for Tilden and Hendricks, and is made by the present Governor Drew.

After some half hour had been spent in reading the papers accompanying the third certificate, Senator Conkling proposed that the reading be regarded as completed and that the result be announced, as under the late act of Congress all the papers would be referred to the provisional tribunal raised to examine such questions. There being no objection, it was so ordered.

The presiding officer asked whether there were objections to counting the vote of the State of Florida.

Mr. FIELD, of New-York, rose and sent to the Clerk's desk a written objection to the first certificate, [for Hayes and Wheeler,] signed by Senators Jones and Conover, of Florida; McDonald, of Indiana; and by Representatives Field, of New-York; Tucker, of Virginia; Janks, of Pennsylvania; and Springer, of Illinois.

Mr. ADAMS, Clerk of the House, proceeded to read the paper. It asserts that those persons [Pierce, Humphreys, Holden, and Young] assumed to act as Presidential Electors never were duly appointed by the State of Florida or in any manner whatever; that the other four persons had been elected, and had an irrevocable title to the office; that the certificate of the first four persons was untruly and corruptly procured, and made in pursuance of a conspiracy between them and M. L. Stearns, late Governor; that they were usurpers, and that their acts were illegal, null, and void.

Further objections being called for, Senator Sargent sent up to the Clerk's desk, on behalf of himself and Senators Conover, Sherman, and Teller, and Representatives Woodburn, Dunnell, Kasson, and McCrary, three several sets of objections to the votes cast by Messrs. Call, Hilton, Bullock, and Yonge, the Democratic Electors, on the ground that the papers are not authenticated as required by the Constitution and laws.

Senator JONES, of Florida, made objection specially to Mr. Humphreys, as holding an office of trust and profit under the United States.

Mr. KASSON, of Iowa, made an additional objection to the third set of certificates because they were not authenticated by a person who held the office of Governor at the time that the functions of the Electors were exercised.

The Presiding Officer—Are there further objections to the counting of the votes of the State of Florida? [After a pause.] If there be none, the certificates and papers, together with other papers accompanying the same, as well as the objections presented, will now be transmitted to the Electoral College Commission for judgment and decision. The Senate will now withdraw to its chamber so that the House may separately determine the objections. (A buzz of dissent as to the closing part of the sentence pervaded the chamber, but the presiding officer made no change.) The Senate retired and after order was restored the House then, at 3.05, resumed its legislative business.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Pennsylvania, moved the previous question on the resolution reported last night from the Florida Investigating Committee, but objection was made on the Republican side of the House to any action in the matter until the minority report should have been presented.

During the session of the Joint Convention, Messrs. Charles O'Conor, William M. Evarts, and Edwin W. Stoughton, of New-York, Jeremiah Black, of Pennsylvania, and Gen. Sherman occupied seats on the floor of the House.

The SPEAKER suggested that as this subject was now the unfinished business, it should be allowed to go over and come up to-morrow as the unfinished business.

Mr. LAPHAM, of New-York, made the point of order that the disputed Electoral votes having been referred to a commission, it was not competent for the House to pass now upon the question.

The SPEAKER said that that was not a point of order. It was a question for the House to determine.

Mr. KASSON—It is a moral point of order.

The Florida question was finally arranged so as to let it go over until Saturday, and then, at 3:35, the House took a recess till 10 o'clock to-morrow.

PROCEEDINGS OF THE COMMISSION.

THE FLORIDA CASE CERTIFIED TO THE COMMISSIONERS — DISCUSSIONS ON THE PRINTING OF THE PAPERS—THE HEARING OF COUNSEL AFTER THE OBJECTORS.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 1.—The Commission appointed under the provisions of the Electoral act to hear and decide all matters in dispute affecting the vote for President and Vice President, met at 3 o'clock to-day in the room of the Supreme Court at the Capitol. The Journal of the preceding session was read, corrected, and approved. A communication from the two houses of Congress in joint session was presented by Mr. Gorham, Secretary of the Senate, and read as follows:

HALL OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, Feb. 1, 1877.

To the President of the Commission:

More than one return, or paper purporting to be a return or certificate, of Electoral votes of the State of Florida having been received and this day opened in the presence of the two houses of Congress, and objections thereto having been made, the said returns, with all accompanying papers and also the objections thereto, are herewith submitted to the judgment and decision of the Commission, as provided by law. THOMAS W. FERRY, President of the Senate.

The Presiding Justice—It is suggested, and I think very properly, that the doors may now be opened, and that proper persons be admitted.

Justice Bradley—I understand there are three certificates from the State of Florida that have been sent to us. I should think that the proper course would be to have those three certificates read, and then, as each is read, let the parties be called upon to state whether they are objected to, and who are the objectors. Until we read those certificates, or hear them read, we do not know what we have before us. After that it will be time to take such other order in regard to the proceedings as may be necessary.

The Presiding Justice—I will adopt that suggestion without a vote.

Mr. Justice Miller—I had the pleasure, Sir, if it was a pleasure, of listening to the reading of those documents in the House of Representatives. If the papers about the State of Florida are read it will take an hour to read them. The objectors' names are to the papers making the objections. I presume they will be printed. They certainly ought to be printed, and then everybody can read them without consuming an hour of time in doing that which every man will want to do for himself more carefully. I think if brother Bradley had known, as I know, the length of these papers, he would, perhaps, withdraw his motion.

The Presiding Justice—Does Justice Bradley withdraw his motion?

Mr. Justice Bradley—I did not make a motion I merely made a suggestion.

Representative Payne—I move that the certificates with the papers be printed at as early an hour as possible.

The Presiding Justice—The motion before the Commission is that the three certificates in the case of Florida be printed, with the objections thereto. If that is your pleasure, you will say, "aye." (Putting the question.) It is agreed to. How soon can they be printed?

Mr. Justice Field—Should we not have copies of the papers presented?

The Presiding Justice—I suppose the certificates and objections may be printed in a very short time. The Secretary will understand that the motion is intended to include the certificates, the objections and the papers that accompany the certificates, and nothing else. It is desirable that they should be printed with as little delay as possible. That matter being disposed of, I am requested to inquire if there are counsel present who will take part after the managers or objectors have stated the case on the one side and the other.

Mr. Evarts—Mr. President: Senator Sargent has come in, and will state what he has to say in that regard.

The Presiding Justice—I will withdraw the inquiry as put, and say to Mr. Sargent that inquiries have been made as to the objectors.

Senator Sargent—The objectors—the persons whose names are signed to the paper—are Senators Conover, Sargent, and Sherman, and Messrs. McCrary, Kasson, Woodburn, and Dunnell, members of the House. There has been no opportunity up to this moment of consulting with these gentlemen to ascertain which of them will state to the Commission their objections.

Senator Sargent—So we understand by the rules.

The Presiding Justice—Who are the two?

Senator Sargent—There has been no opportunity for consultation to ascertain which of the objectors would present the matter to the court.

The Presiding Justice—Please make them known to the Commission as soon as is convenient.

Senator Sargent—We will do so.

The Presiding Justice.—Will Mr. Field state the names of the objectors on the other side?

Representative Field.—The objectors to the first return are Senators Jones, of Florida, Senator Cooper and Representatives Thompson, Jenks, and myself.

Representative Abbott—Mr. President, I desire to inquire whether the motion made in reference to printing covers the printing of all papers that are sent here, with the objections, because it seems to me that we are to consider all papers sent, with the objections, and it is just as material for us to have those papers printed, so that we can consider them, as it is to have the objections themselves.

The Presiding Justice—I do not understand the vote in that way at present. It is that the certificates with the objections and the papers which accompany the certificates shall be printed, not all the papers that may have been sent.

Representative Abbott—I suggest then that, if we are to consider the papers accompanying the objections, they may at some point of time be made part of the cause. The objections themselves would hardly be understood without the papers, and we should have those papers printed or put in such form as will enable us to act on them.

The Presiding Justice—There is no motion on that subject.

Representative Abbott—I now move that the papers accompanying the objections be also printed.

Senator Edmunds—Mr. President, I submit that it is possible, under the statute under which we are acting, that there may be no papers lawfully and within the statute accompanying an objection. The statute provides for papers that accompany certificates, but, as I remember at this moment, (I speak subject, of course, to correction,) it does not provide for papers accompanying the objections, so that, I think, it will be a matter for the consideration of the Commission in consultation how far printing the testimony that may be offered, whether by objectors or anybody else, we ought to go. It may be a question for consideration whether time would warrant us in receiving and printing everything that may be proposed on either side.

Senator Thurman—Mr. President, it is true that the statute requires the papers accompanying certificates to be laid before the Commission, but it also authorizes the Commission to take into view all documents, depositions, and other papers that may be competent and pertinent to this inquiry, and if we have received papers from either of the houses which, in the estimation of the houses, it is proper to send to us, it seems to me that we must look at them and see whether they are competent and pertinent. I think, therefore, that the motion to print ought to be adopted. That will not delay us in having by to-morrow morning, as early as we see fit to meet, printed copies of the certificates and the objections. We can give directions that they shall be sent to us immediately, and the printing of these other papers can go on. Knowing the great rapidity with which work is done at the Government Printing Office, I do not think we should have to wait very long to get them all.

Representative Abbott—Mr. President, I think in looking at the law the objections only are to be sent here, and I fancy that those papers, if they are sent here at all must come as part of the objections, so that perhaps the motion to print the objections would carry with it necessarily the printing of those papers. I do not see how they get here except as papers accompanying the certificates or as part of the objections. Of course I have no desire to impede the printing of the objections or the certificates, but wish to get them as soon as possible.

Senator Edmunds—Mr. President, in order that we may consider that topic, I move the motion of Judge Abbott be, for the time being, laid upon the table so that we may consider about it a little afterward.

The Presiding Justice—The motion is to lay the motion of Judge Abbott upon the table.

Representative Abbott—I withdraw the motion for the time, to be renewed at a subsequent time.

The Presiding Judge—The motion is withdrawn. [A pause.] I am requested now to call for the names of counsel who appear in the case on each side.

Representative Field—We have several counsel on our side. We have Mr. O'Conor, of New-York; Judge Black, of Pennsylvania; Judge Trumbull, of Illinois; Mr. Merrick, of Washington, and Mr. Green, of New-Jersey.

The Presiding Justice—Counsel not exceeding two in number on each side are allowed to participate in argument.

Representative Field—We have not selected those two. I only mentioned the names to vou in answer to the question how many there are who are concerned in the case. We shall arrange that matter in course of the evening.

The Presiding Justice—That will answer. Who are counsel on the other side?

Mr. Evarts—As representing objectors to certificates other than those that have been represented in the enumeration by Mr. Field, I will state that Messrs. Stoughton, Stanley Matthews, Shellabarger, and myself are expected to represent objectors in some of the cases which will appear, and I would ask the instruction of the court—it is pertinent to make the inquiry—as to what is included in the phrase "on the merits of any case presented to it;" whether that means any issue joined on objections to any particular certificate, or whether it includes all which arises in the case of a particular State?

The Presiding Justice—I think the counsel will have to judge of that matter for themselves. Unless they have some question to submit to the Commission, it is hardly within the province of the Presiding Justice to determine that.

Mr. Evarts—We understand, then, if the Commission please, that the designation of two counsel will be sufficiently early made when the case is up?

Senator Edmunds—That is merely for the final argument.

The Presiding Justice—After the objectors have opened the case.

Mr. Evarts—So we understand.

Mr. Justice Bradley—I suggest to Mr. Evarts that probably the construction of that would be "the case on its merits." The principal question would be included in that term, and all interlocutory or other motions would not be included in that phrase.

Senator Edmunds—It covers the whole subject of a particular State.

Senator Sargent—In reply to the question of the Commission as to which of the objectors would present the case aside from counsel on the conference, it is determined that Mr. McCrary and Mr. Kasson will appear.

Senator Edmunds—I move that the public sitting of the Commission be now adjourned until 10:30 in the morning, unless counsel or objectors have something further to say at this time.

Representative Garfield—I think there was one objection filed regarding which no action has been taken; an objection, I believe, from Senator Jones. I have heard the President of the Commission make no allusion to it. I inquire whether there is any special hearing to be had on that objection? I think that objection was different from the other objections which have been filed. I refer to it because it makes a distinct case and is a different objection in its character from either of the other two that have been referred to.

The Presiding Justice—My impression is (though I do not make that decision in behalf of the Commission) that the several objections to the returns from a State constitute one case, and two objectors will be heard upon one side and two on the other, and after they have been heard, two counsel will be heard upon one side and two upon the other. Unless otherwise advised by the Commission, that will be the ruling.

Representative Field—Will you allow me to say that perhaps there may be some misunderstanding in regard to that rule unless I state to you precisely the facts?

The Presiding Justice—Proceed, Sir.

Representative Field—There are objections to the four votes of Florida on each side; that is to say, we object to the four votes mentioned in the first return.

Senator Edmunds—Which are they?

Representative Field—They are, if I may use the names of the candidates, the Hayes Electors. We object on our part to those votes, certificates, and lists.

Mr. Edmunds—And the other gentlemen object to the others.

Representative Field, Mr. Sargent, Mr. Kasson, and the gentleman on the other side specifically object to ours. Then there is the additional objection made by Senator Jones, of Florida, and others to one of the Hayes Electors as ineligible under the Constitution. That is a distinct matter, and we supposed it would be taken up quite distinctly. It is a minor affair and should not encumber the principal one, and, if the Commission will allow us, we will designate as objectors Mr. Thompson and Mr. Jenks. I suppose the discussion of that matter will not take up much of the time of the Commission. At all events, as a matter of form, if you will allow us, we will suggest that Mr. Thompson and Mr. Jenks be the objectors, and as to counsel, we will advise to-night, and inform the Commission to-morow who will represent us.

The Presiding Justice—When you are advised what you desire, you will submit a motion to the Commission and I will have it determined. At present I am not prepared to rule otherwise than I have. If there be no further suggestion to be presented, I will put the question to the Commission that when this Commission adjourn it adjourn to meet at 10:30 o'clock to-morrow morning.

Senator Edmunds—I will move, so that we shall not keep gentlemen who wish to prepare their matters for the Commission, that the public sittings of the Commission be now adjourned until 10:30 o'clock to-morrow morning.

Senator Thurman—But the Commission to continue in session to-day?

Senator Edmunds—Yes, for consultation.

The Presiding Justice—Under the circumstances I will put the motion, with the consent of the mover, that when the Commission adjourn it adjourn until to-morrow at 10:30 o'clock.

The motion was agreed to.

The Presiding Justice—I will notify all who are present that there will be no more public business transacted by the Commission to-day.

Senator Frelinghuysen—I was about to suggest that it would be well to understand from the objectors and counsel whether they will be prepared to go on to-morrow morning.

Representative Field—On our part, we are prepared to go on at any moment. We are prepared to go on now if you wish.

The Presiding Justice—The gentlemen present may understand that there will be no further public business transacted by the Commission to-day. The Commission will remain for private consultation.

The room having been cleared, the Commission remained for consultation, and, after some time spent in deliberation, the Commission adjourned till to-morrow (Friday) morning at 10 o'clock.

OBJECTIONS TO THE FLORIDA VOTE.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 1.—The following are the objections presented in the House of Representatives in the Florida case:

THE DEMOCRATIC OBJECTION.

The undersigned, Charles W. Jones, Senator of the United States from the State of Florida; Henry Cooper, Senator of the United States from the State of Tennessee; J. E. McDonald, Senator of the United States from the State of Indiana; David Dudley Field, Representative from the State of New-York; J. Randolph Tucker, Representative from the State of Virginia; G. A. Jenks, Representative from the State of Pennsylvania, and William M. Springer, Representative from the State of Illinois, objected to the counting of the votes of Charles H. Pearce, Frederick C. Humphreys, William H. Holden, and Thomas W. Long as Electors of President and Vice President of the United States, in, for, and on behalf of the State of Florida, and to the paper purporting to be a certificate of the votes of said Electors, and to the lists of votes cast by them, and to the papers which accompany the certificates shall be printed, not all the papers that may have been sent.

Representative Abbott—I suggest then that, if we are to consider the papers accompanying the objections, they may at some point of time be made part of the cause. The objections themselves would hardly be understood without the papers, and we should have those papers printed or put in such form as will enable us to act on them.

The Presiding Justice—There is no motion on that subject.

from California [Mr. Sargent] said the Senator from Iowa [Mr. Allison.]

Mr. SARGENT said there were special reasons why he must decline, one of which was that he was a member of the Florida Investigating Committee.

The restumation of Mr. Sargent was accepted, and Mr. Ingalls, of Kansas, was appointed in his place.

The CHAIR said, under the act of the 29th of January, known as the Electoral Count act, the Senate was required to appear in the House of Representatives at 1 o'clock to-day to take part in the count of the votes for President and Vice President of the United States. It now wanted two minutes of that time.

Mr. EDMUNDS, of Vermont, moved that the Senate now proceed in a body to the hall of the House of Representatives. Agreed to. And the Senate, headed by its officers, left the chamber. At 3:10 o'clock the Senate returned, and legislative business was resumed.

The Senate then resumed the consideration of the point of order submitted by Mr. Merrimon, against receiving the report of a sub-committee of the Committee on Privileges and Elections on the eligibility of Electors. Mr. MERRIMON withdrew his point, and the report was then read by Mr. CAMERON. Mr. KERNAN, of New-York, the minority of the sub-committee, could not agree with the majority of the committee in their conclusions. It was ordered that the report of the sub-committee be printed.

The Senate then, at 4:15 P. M., went into executive session, and when the doors were reopened took a recess until 10 o'clock to-morrow morning.

POLICEMEN ON TRIAL.

Patrolmen McConan and Gaylord, of the Twentieth Precinct, were arraigned before President Smith yesterday, charged with improper conduct in playing cards while on duty. These officers were, on the night of Dec. 9, 1876, sent to an illicit distillery in West Forty-first street, between Tenth and Eleventh avenues, which had been seized by the officers of the Internal Revenue Service and had been placed in charge of a number of keepers. The officers were to protect and aid the keepers. During the night the keepers were surprised and 44 barrels of whisky were carried off. James Shaw, an aged keeper, complained that at various times during the evening he saw the officers inside the distillery playing euchre with two of the keepers. The accused, who were represented by ex-Judge Busteed, produced three of the keepers who were on duty in the place, and they testified that the officers were not playing cards in the building at any time during the night, but remained patrolling on the sidewalk in front of the premises until 11 o'clock, when they were called in by one of the keepers when the attack was made in the rear of the building. Patrolman Kelly testified that he was on the same six hours during the tour of duty, and on each occasion they were on patrol in front of the distillery, and Sergt. Brogan and Roundsman Files also testified to visiting the men during the evening and finding them attending to their duty. As the complainant said that he had a witness who would corroborate his testimony, but he was absent, the case was adjourned for one week.

Detective Garrett S. Walling, of the Twenty-seventh Precinct, was also arraigned on complaint of Mrs. Rosa Kraft, who alleges that the officer who arrested her husband, Hiram Kraft, in San Francisco, in October, 1874, took from him a quantity of jewelry, $190 in greenbacks, and $407 in gold, for which he failed to account. The accused officer showed by a transcript from the records of the San Francisco Police Office, that all the property he received from Kraft was $190 in currency and a quantity of jewelry, the latter valued at $40. This money to Kraft, and paid $150 to his counsel in accordance with Kraft's instructions. The jewelry he placed in the hands of Mrs. Kraft, and produced her receipt to that effect. The woman thereupon admitted that she had received the jewelry.

STOLEN PROPERTY RECOVERED.

On Tuesday last, while Mrs. Tidball, wife of Col. William Linn Tidball, of No. 157 West Twenty-third street, and her daughter Fannie, were passing through Twenty-sixth street, between Sixth and Seventh avenues, they noticed a two boys going along the street, each of them carrying a handsome seal-skin sacque. Mrs. Tidball, from the manner in which the boys acted, became convinced that the sacques had been stolen, and approached the lads and accused them of the theft. The lads ran across the street, and handed the sacques to a man who was evidently waiting for them. Mrs. Tidball went over to this man, and, taking hold of one of the sacques, remarked, "I know this is stolen, and I'll hold on to it." The man tore the sacque from the lady's grasp, and ran into the basement of a house in Twenty-sixth street. Mrs. Tidball gave information to Capt. Tynan, of the Sixteenth Precinct, and Detective Cain yesterday arrested Joseph Slater, residing at No. 161 West Twenty-sixth street, who was fully identified by Mrs. Tidball as the man she had seen in communication with the boys. The sacques, which are valued at $400, were found to be the property of Fanny Rindskopf, of No. 11 East Thirty-fourth street, and Sarah M. Nathan, of No. 118 East Fifty-eighth street. One of the sacques was found in Simpson's pawn shop, on the Bowery, and the other at a pawn shop in Twenty-ninth street, near Sixth avenue. Slater was arraigned before Justice Flammer at the Washington Place Police Court yesterday and was remanded for examination.

ROWDIES HELD FOR TRIAL.

Philip Brady, who recently kept a dance-house at No. 175 Greene street, David Mooney, who is said to be a hotel thief, recently from Sing Sing, and John Smith, whose antecedents are not so well known as those of his companions, were arraigned before Justice Flammer, at the Washington Place Police Court yesterday charged with felonious assault on complaint of Thomas Gill, who keeps a "free and easy," at No. 15 West Houston street. The complaintant alleged that Brady, Mooney, and Smith, accompanied by Thomas King, entered his establishment on Wednesday evening and created a disturbance there, and while he was endeavoring to eject them Brady drew from his pocket a pair of Derringers, and Mooney pulled out a revolver and threatened to kill him. Before they could carry their threats into execution Officers Murphy, Reynolds, and Sergeant Carroll, of the Eighth Precinct, entered the place and arrested the belligerent. While being taken to the Station-house Mooney dropped on the sidewalk a pair of nippers and several skeleton keys. Brady claimed that he was assaulted by King in Gill's establishment, and drew the pistols to defend himself. The accused were held for trial in default of $2,000 bail each.

ROBBING A CHILD OF HIS COAT.

Peter Quinn, aged 50, of No. 87 Mott street, was arraigned at the Tombs Police Court yesterday on the charge of abducting the little boy, John Kane, who resides at No. 86 Centre street, and robbing him of his overcoat, worth $5. Quinn, who had shaved his beard and whiskers off to alter his appearance, was nevertheless, immediately identified by the boy, who picked him out of a line of men who were presented to him. The charge was that Quinn met the boy on the 29th inst. at the corner of Leonard and Elm streets, and induced him, by the promise of a silver quarter of a dollar, to go with him to Washington Market, where he took him into an alleyway and threatened to kill boy, who refused to go with him unless he gave him his coat. This the boy said he refused to do, when Quinn seized him and tore it from him and ran off with it. Quinn was held for trial in default of $2,000 bail on the charge of robbery, the charge of abduction being dismissed.

LAW REPORTS.

SEVERAL MARRIAGES AND DIVORCES

THE DISCLOSURES MADE IN THE SUIT OF ALDEN AGAINST MR. AND MRS. ROBINSON—A FESTIVE WEDDING PARTY AND THE BILL OF CHARGES.

A case in which revelations are made of somewhat remarkable social relations alleged to exist between several persons was made the subject of a decision by Judge Lawrence, in Supreme Court, Chambers, yesterday. The suit in question is brought by Stephen H. Alden against Eugene N. Robinson and his wife, Mary Robinson, and was brought before the court on a motion by Alden to set aside an order of reference, he claiming that the order had been obtained by collusion between Daniel C. Birdsall, formerly his counsel, and the counsel for the defendants. According to the plaintiff, he sued Georgiana V. Alden in the Summer of 1873, and Birdsall then acted as the latter's counsel. A settlement of the difficulty was had, but Alden, having thus become acquainted with Birdsall, employed the latter as his counsel in a suit against the firm of Drew, Robinson, Chase & Co., in which certain bonds of the Cleveland, Painesville, and Ashtabula Railroad Company were concerned. Birdsall, in a consultation with Alden, advised the latter to make a transfer of the bonds to his (Alden's) daughter. Following Birdsall's advice, Alden wrote to his daughter, Mrs. Harriet Ada Trubee, telling her that he gave her the bonds. He antedated the letter so as to make it appear that the transfer of the bonds had been made prior to the panic of 1873. Alden discovered afterward that he had mistaken the bonds, and so no suit was brought. Alden, however, having become financially embarrassed, on the advice of Birdsall, conveyed his country seat at Westport, Conn., to his daughter, Mrs. Trubee. Birdsall kept visiting Alden's house for some time. After many of such visits Alden's daughter expressed a desire to come to this City for a visit of two or three weeks. Alden assented, and they came here and took up their quarters at a boarding-house in Twenty-third street. Birdsall also took board at the house. Shortly afterward Alden says he became displeased at the conduct of his daughter and Birdsall, and he asked her to return to her home in Connecticut. She refused, and Alden left the boarding-house. Birdsall and Alden's daughter, however, remained there, as alleged, occupying adjoining sleeping rooms communicating with each other. Alden's daughter was then 24 years of age and had two children. She was the wife of Samuel C. Trubee, who was then living, but he had separated from him, and was seeking a divorce. Birdsall, when remonstrated with on account of his conduct, said that they were engaged to be married, and were to be married as soon as each obtained a divorce, she from her husband, and Birdsall from his wife. Mrs. Trubee refused to convey back to Alden the country seat at Connecticut. Birdsall induced her to begin a suit for $8,000 against Alden, and Abraham D. Hoagland, a bartender and a relative of Birdsall, sued Alden, as Mrs. Trubee's Assignee, for the alleged wrongful conversion of the Cleveland, Painesville and Ashtabula bonds. These, it was claimed, were worth $30,000, and Alden was arrested in the suit. Birdsall was during this time acting as Alden's attorney in the latter's suit against Mr. and Mrs. Robinson. This suit was begun in December, 1873. In it Alden alleges that Robinson, in the Spring of 1872, having previously been divorced from his wife, Ann, and being desirous of marrying his daughter, Mrs. Mary Tracy, was obliged to go out of the State to have the ceremony performed, because the decree of divorce against him obtained by his first wife prevented him from marrying again in this State. Robinson and Alden then agreed that the wedding should take place at the latter's country seat at Westport, Conn. No expense was to be spared by Alden in getting up the wedding festivities on the grandest scale as to splendor and magnificence. For the expenses, Alden was to be reimbursed by Robinson. The wedding took place on May 1, 1872, and its cost was $10,000. Mrs. Robinson remained at Alden's house until June 1, and then they asked Alden to allow his wife to accompany them on a trip to the North and West. Alden assented to this, supposing the trip was merely for pleasure. He afterward discovered, as he claims, that the object of the trip was to cover up the too sudden advent of a child, a stranger on the scene, which it was desirable to keep from the knowledge of their friends. On the trip Alden says Robinson was frequently intoxicated, and Mrs. Alden was compelled to nurse him and keep him from injuring himself or his wife, which he frequently threatened to do. He threatened at one time to shoot Mrs. Alden with a loaded pistol, and she was severely injured in wresting the weapon from his grasp. Mrs. Alden also acted as nurse to Mrs. Robinson at Madison, Wis., where the party remained for several weeks. For all these services and expenses, as claimed, Robinson entered into a contract with Alden, and proposed to the latter to open an account with his firm, Robinson, Chase & Co.—for the purchase and sale of stocks. Mr. and Mrs. Robinson promised to protect Alden from loss and pay him out of the profits. The losses, however, amounted to $44,442. Of this, $22,221, or one-half the amount of the loss, was retained from the money in their hands belonging to Alden. The original motion for a reference in this suit was made in February, 1874, by the consent of Birdsall, when the latter and Alden were hostile to each other, and just before the suit of Hoagland against Alden was brought. Alden claims that the reference was owing to Birdsall's collusion with Robinson's counsel. Both the latter and Birdsall, however, denied the charges of collusion in the most positive manner, and Judge Lawrence denied the motion for vacating the order of reference, holding that the charge of collusion was entirely withdrawn. Robinson and his wife put in answers denying the material allegations made by Alden.

A DIVORCE GRANTED.

The report of the Referee, in the case of Mary A. Van Dolsen against John Van Dolsen, Jr., was filed in the Supreme Court yesterday. The plaintiff sued for an absolute divorce from her husband on the ground of his adultery. It appeared in the recent divorce suit brought by Dr. Nathan P. Rice against Anna B. Rice that John Van Dolsen, Jr., was accused of improprieties with Mrs. Rice before and after her marriage. On discovering this, Mrs. Van Dolsen began her suit for divorce, and the Referee reports in her favor.

A WRIT OF HABEAS CORPUS DISMISSED.

Judge Joseph F. Daly, in the Special Term of the Court of Common Pleas, yesterday decided the matter of William Booth, who is imprisoned under an execution issued out of the Tenth District Court, and who sought release from custody by writ of habeas corpus. Booth, it appears, was sued by a man named Corse on account of a horse trade. The action was brought in the District Court, and was commenced by summons. The pleadings were oral, and the indorsement on the record is "complaint for damages, trade of a horse, breach of warranty; answer denies any warranty, offers to re-trade, denies any damage." Booth was not arrested before judgment, nor was any warrant obtained. The case was tried, and the Justice gave judgment in Corse's favor for $50 damages. He stated in the judgment that the defendant was liable to arrest on execution, and an entry to that effect was made in the docket. Booth was arrested on execution, and Judge Daly thinks the action must be considered as one for fraud and deceit, and that the Justice had authority to adjudge the defendant liable to arrest. The justice of such a judgment, he says, cannot be called in question in the habeas corpus proceeding. The execution against the person need not recite that the action was one in which the defendant was liable to arrest, nor that the Justice has so adjudged, nor that such an entry has been made in the docket. It is sufficient if the judgment and docket show those facts. The writ of habeas corpus is dismissed and the prisoner remanded.

MAXWELL AND THE CHECK FORGERY

The examination in the case of George L. Maxwell, the broker charged with complicity in the forgery of a check for $64,225, purporting to have been issued by the New-York Life Insurance Company and made payable by the Union Trust Company, was begun yesterday morning at the Tombs Police Court before Justice Duffy. Mr. Wheeler H. Peckham appeared for the District Attorney and the Union Trust Company, and Mr. Clarence A. Seward and Gen. John A. Foster for Maxwell. Mr. Peckham called Sylvester L. Blood, in whose office at No. 16 Exchange place Maxwell has a desk. He testified as follows: I got a check purporting to be drawn by the New-York Life Insurance Company from Maxwell on the 2d of January; he handed me the check, saying that he had an up-town customer who wanted to buy some gold, and he would see to take the check; I took it, got it cashed, and gave five $10,000 gold certificates out of the proceeds to Maxwell on the following day, and on the 5th January I gave Maxwell a gold check for $9,500.

To Mr. Seward—Maxwell handed me the $64,000 check; I was trying to borrow money on that day; my book-keeper indorsed the check; I did not indorse the check, nor see Maxwell indorse it; I can't tell whether the check was indorsed when Maxwell handed it to me; I loaned $15,000 of the proceeds of the check to a Mr. Mitchell and $10,000 to E. H. Chapin on the day I got the check cashed, and got 7 per cent. interest; I did not pay Maxwell for the use of the proceeds of the check over night; I don't remember saying that I made these loans to show that I was easy financially on that day; I should have been $40,000 short that day had it not been for Maxwell's money; but I could have covered this deficiency, and had asked a Mr. Richards to get me a loan, but countermanded the order after I got the check from Maxwell; I understood that I was to make the check good the next day; I don't know that I was so much under the influence of liquor on the afternoon of the day that I got the check that I had to be put in a coupé and sent home; I have seen Horace B. Browne in my office before; I saw him on the 2d of January.

To Mr. Peckham—I was short on the day I got the check, and wanted to borrow some money; it is not unusual for brokers to borrow money from day to day, according as they are long or short; I was subpœnaed to come here by the defense; Maxwell and myself are members of the Stock Exchange.

Lemuel C. Wightman, called by Mr. Peckham, testified: I am book-keeper for Mr. Blood, and deposited the $64,000 check to his credit; I recognize my indorsement and that of Maxwell on the check; I saw Maxwell indorse it; it went through the bank and was paid, and was entered on our books to the credit of Sylvester L. Blood.

Horace E. Browne was brought up from his cell and identified by witness, who resumed: I first saw Browne in 1868; I have seen him occasionally since, but not to speak with him until last Fall, when he came to our office to see Maxwell about soap; Maxwell told me that he was experimenting in soap that Browne was making for him in Brooklyn; Browne was in the office two or three times a day up to the 2d of January; on that day I received a letter for Maxwell about 11 o'clock in the morning; the man who brought it was a stranger to me; gave the letter to Maxwell, who apparently gave an answer to the messenger in writing; I received another letter that day for Maxwell.

At this point, writs of habeas corpus and certiorari, issued by Judge Donohue, returnable to-day, and requiring the production of Julius Kelter, the witness who swore he had received the $9,500 gold check from Maxwell, and who was served a writ upon Justice Duffy, who made return that Kelter had been committed to the House of Detention as a witness, as his evidence given in the Chadwick case was very material, and was of a nature making it necessary that his presence should be secured at the trial, either by his confinement or the giving of adequate bail.

William H. Beers, Vice President and Actuary of the New-York Life Insurance Company, called by Mr. Peckham, identified the check. He said: The signatures to the check are not genuine; the company did not authorize the issuing of any such check; I know, employ Maxwell to negotiate for gold or securities; I did not write the letters written in reference to the check nor sign them; the company did not purchase any gold during January; on the 30th of last December the company issued a check on the Union Trust Company for $64,000, and on the following morning a check, and on the 4th of January another one numbered 1,239, (the same number as the forged check,) for $185,000; no check was issued by the Company between these two.

To Mr. Seward—I have known Maxwell many years; I never recollect having any business transactions with him; I had a brother-in-law named Henry Sairley; I don't recollect loaning him any money on Maxwell's account; when the forged check was first shown to me, I said that the signature purporting to be mine looked like mine, but was rather wild; I can't tell whether the four checks numbered 1,905, 1,896, 1,997, and 1,998, cut from the last leaf of the check-book, have been used.

Mr. Seward handed witness a plain check without signature or stamp mark and asked him to compare it with those in the check-book, and with what Mr. Seward called the "alleged" forged check.

Witness resumed: This plain check is similar in appearance to those in the book, but it and the forged check are a little shorter and more indistinct than the genuine, especially the water-marked lettering; Mr. Theodore M. Banta, the Cashier of the company, was the first who discovered the forgery; the company has not employed any one to make an investigation in regard to the forged check; we have had our books balanced at the banks to see whether any more forged checks were out, but have discovered none so far as I know; I have recommended counter in the forged check is a little higher placed than the numbers punched in the genuine ones.

To Mr. Peckham—There would be little trouble for any one to get possession of the letter-paper of the company, with the company's title on it, from some of the offices or agencies of the company.

The further hearing of the case was adjourned to 10:30 A. M. on Monday next.

SUIT AGAINST THE WILLIAMSBURG CITY.

The trial of the suit of Michael Keefe against the Williamsburg City Fire Insurance Company, in which the plaintiff seeks the recovery of $2,000 on a policy issued by the defendants insuring his stock of dry goods in a store on Grand street, Brooklyn, E. D., was resumed yesterday in the Supreme Court, before Judge Pratt and a jury. Similar suits against the Imperial the National, and the Continental insurance companies, in which the plaintiff was insured to the amounts named, owing to total damage alleged to have been sustained being $8,000. The defense is that the goods contained in the store of the plaintiff, which was burned out in March 8, 1874, were not worth the amount claimed, and that he swore falsely concerning their value. Besides this the defendants set up an allegation that the store of the plaintiff was set fire to. The trial of the case was commenced on Wednesday when Mr. Keefe gave testimony as to the value of property, and then rested his case. Counsel for the defendant insisting, however, that the plaintiff must put in all his proof concerning the value of the goods and should be permitted to furnish cumulative evidence in rebuttal, Charles B. Seward was placed upon the stand yesterday and testified that he, in company with a Mr. Mahoney, made an inventory of the goods in the store after the fire. The prices he thought were fair as well as the estimate of the damages. The plaintiff was then cross-examined at great length as to his purchases for some time preceding the date of the fire. He could only remember very little, and when his examination was concluded defendant's counsel moved to dismiss the complaint on the ground that the appraisement was made two months before the proofs of service were made, which the policy provided should be served at as early a day as possible. The case was then opened for the defendant, and counsel stated he expected to show that the plaintiff knew all about the fire; that it was discovered in two places, and that it was not caused by the overturning of the stove. The case is still on.

AN ATTORNEY'S DEFENSE.

Judge Donohue, in Supreme Court, Chambers, yesterday, ordered a reference in the matter of D. C. Backus, an attorney, which came up on a motion directing the latter to show cause why he should not execute and deliver to Mrs. Mary Pirnie an assignment in writing of the interest in the estate of Peter Martin, deceased, which he (Backus) obtained by an assignment made by Peter M. Pirnie, the husband of Mary Pirnie. Mr. Pirnie made affidavit that in July, 1875, he claimed an interest in a share of the estate of Mr. Martin, and determined to assign such interest to his wife, Mary, to reimburse her for losses sustained through him. He consulted Backus on the subject, and was told by the latter that any assignment by him to his wife must be through a third party. Pirnie then assigned the interest in question to Backus for the purpose of having the latter transfer it to Mrs. Pirnie. Mr. Pirnie now says that Backus never did this, but kept the interest for himself. Backus, however, makes affidavit that as the interest was a family matter Mrs. Pirnie did not wish to appear as a party and prosecute the claim personally. The assignment was therefore made to him to prosecute, and he was to turn over the proceeds to Mrs. Pirnie, after deducting therefrom his charges in this and other proceedings. He claims the whole amount was due to him for professional services rendered to Mr. and Mrs. Pirnie.

ALLEGED FRAUDULENT BANKRUPTS.

SERIOUS CHARGES AGAINST THE FIRM OF E. L. & GEORGE W. SNOW—ALLEGATIONS AGAINST BAMBERGER & GANS.

The firm of E. L. & George W. Snow, dealers in galvanized iron, at No. 206 Water street, failed last October, with liabilities amounting to $200,000. They offered to pay 40 cents on the dollar, and exhibited assets amounting to $70,000. The creditors claim that the firm, previous to failing, mutilated and falsified their books, refused to exhibit their general ledger, and concealed a portion of their assets. Under pressure of these charges they added $30,000 to their assets shortly after the failure. Some days ago a number of the creditors went before United States Commissioner Betts, and made affidavits to the effect that the bankrupt firm were still concealing a large proportion of their assets, and that they were quite able to pay 100 cents on the dollar, instead of 40 cents, as they proposed doing. Warrants were accordingly issued for the arrest of the offending parties, and on their being arraigned before the Commissioner yesterday, a Mr. Levi, a former partner of E. L. Snow, testified that he [Snow] upon several occasions proposed to him that the firm should fail, stating that in this way they could easily make $75,000 or $100,000. Mr. Levi further swears that Mr. Snow has already served a term in the Penitentiary for receiving stolen goods. Under these circumstances, Commissioner Betts fixed the amount of bail for the prisoners at $100,000. Their counsel objected to this being excessive, and appealed to Judge Blatchford. On a motion for a reduction, the Judge yesterday reduced the bail to $10,000, which amount was promptly given.

Last Summer the firm of Bamberger & Gans, dealers in children's goods and fancy articles, at No. 363 Canal street, failed and went into voluntary bankruptcy. On the examination of the case before Register Allien, a number of the creditors became satisfied that the firm were concealing a large proportion of their assets with the intention to defraud. Accordingly, a thorough examination of the books and affairs of the bankrupts was made, and resulted in the creditors going before United States Commissioner Betts and swearing out warrants for the arrest of the alleged offenders. They were arrested yesterday and taken before the Commissioner, who admitted them to bail in the sum of $10,000. Lewis Gans, a brother of M. Gans, who, with Gilbert Bamberger, constituted the firm of Bamberger & Gans, was also arrested and arraigned before the Commissioner on a charge of perjury, alleged to have been committed during the examination before Register Allen. Bail in this case was also fixed at $10,000, and was readily furnished.

COURT NOTES.

Peter Marx, of No. 410 East Thirteenth street, was fined $50 in the Court of Special Sessions yesterday for beating his fallen horse furiously on the head and body with a heavy "bale-stick."

Mark Rohnozer, a vagrant, aged 18 years, stole two lockets, a chain, and other property, from Mary E. Bogardus, of No. 255 West 41st street, on the 10th of January. In the Court of General Sessions, yesterday, Rohnozer pleaded guilty, and Judge Gildersleeve sentenced him to one year in the Penitentiary.

A man giving the name of John Raymond, and who was formerly a Tombs lawyer, was sentenced to one day's imprisonment yesterday by Justice Kilbreth, at the Tombs Police Court, on a charge of stealing a goose, which he had seized from a stand and used as a club to beat a man with whom he was fighting.

Judge Lawrence, in the Special Term of the Supreme Court, yesterday rendered a decision in the case of the University of the City of New-York against the Mayor, &c., in which the plaintiffs sued to set aside an assessment sale of some of their property because of certain technical informalities. Judgment is given by Judge Lawrence in favor of the City.

Patrolman Deming, of the Ninth Precinct, at an early hour yesterday morning, surprised three men in the act of breaking into the liquor store of Michael Burn, No. 363 Hudson street. At the approach the burglars fled, but the officer arrested one of them, who gave his name as James Driscoll. Justice Flammer committed him in default of $2,000 bail.

The case of Olendorf against Wilson was argued at great length by Gen. Roger A. Pryor and Simon Sterne before Judge Joseph F. Daly, in the Court of Common Pleas, yesterday, but to the great disgust of the reporters, nothing was divulged touching the secret methods of coloring and refining of teas, about which the suit is brought. Judge Daly reserved his decision.

Thomas McSpedon was Fire Marshal of the City in 1872, and his salary was reduced by the Board of Apportionment from $5,000 to $4,000 per year. He brought suit in the Supreme Court to recover the difference between the salaries, but Judge Lawrence, in Special Term, yesterday dismissed his complaint on the ground that McSpedon's office was a City office, and the board had the power to make the reduction in the salary.

In Part 1. of the Court of General Sessions, yesterday, Assistant District Attorney Rollins accepted pleas of guilty of James Reilly, who stole two pairs of shoes from the premises of William Henderson, No. 390 Third avenue, and James Kelly, and James Burns, two youths, who broke a pane of glass, and stole a carving knife from the store of John Stirrup, No. 193 Washington street. Judge Gildersleeve sentenced the prisoners to two years each in State Prison.

Henry H. Dexter, who sold goods on commission for the firm of Ball & Ray during the past four years, now sues in the Court of Common Pleas to recover the amount of his commissions. He says the sales made by him amounted to about $250,000. He sought to obtain access to the firm books, but Judge Joseph F. Daly denied, yesterday, a motion motion made for such purpose, but he says the plaintiff is entitled to have from the firm a sworn statement of sales made by him or through his procurement.

A JUDGMENT FOR THE CITY.

The City recovered a judgment yesterday, dismissing complaint and for $577 94 costs, in the action of Roswell B. Taylor against the Mayor, &c. This is another of the almost innumerable claims of which the "Ring" was the parent. The plaintiff sued as Assignee of the notorious old Daily Transcript to recover $11,000 for publishing the minutes of the Boards of Aldermen and Assistant Aldermen for the first three months of 1872. The City defended on the ground that the amount charged was excessive, and put in as a counter-claim the large amounts of money which the Transcript had fraudulently obtained during Tweed's régime. As the case involved the examination of a long account it was in May, 1875, referred to John P. O'Neill as Referee. He found that the sum tardy due for the work in suit was $6,639, but that the Transcript Association had between 1868 and 1871 wrongfully and fraudulently procured bills to be audited and paid, the overcharges in which reached the enormous amount of $173,518 90, which sum the defendants could recoup and set off against the claim of Taylor. His complaint is therefore dismissed, with costs.

THE SALARY OF AN OFFICIAL.

The case of Thomas Cottman against the Mayor, &c., was decided by Judge Joseph F. Daly, in the Special Term of the Court of Common Pleas, yesterday. The plaintiff alleges that he was Inspector of Street-cleaning between April 27, 1870, and June 6, 1872. His salary was fixed at $4,000 per year, and he was paid at that rate up to March 1, 1872. On Sept. 27, 1871, the Board of Health passed a resolution cutting off all the salaries of their employes. In view of this resolution, Cottman sent a letter to the Board of Health on Feb. 21, 1872, in which he offered to do his work gratuitously from March 1, 1872. This proposition was accepted, but in April, 1873, the Board of Health passed a resolution awarding him $1,000 for his services in 1872. He sues on this award. The City demurred on the ground of a defect of parties, since it was necessary to make the Board of Health a defendant. The plaintiff then moved for judgment on account of the frivolousness of the demurrer. Judge Daly denies this motion, holding that the Board of Health is a necessary party.

A WAREHOUSE-MAN IN TROUBLE.

Thaddeus K. Whitlock, who keeps a storage warehouse at No. 43 Water street, and lives at No. 467 Layfayette avenue, Brooklyn, was arrested yesterday by Detectives Field, and O'Connor, of the District Attorney's office, on an indictment charging him with unlawfully issuing warehouse receipts. It is charged that Whitlock, on the 23d January, endeavored to raise money from Gustav A. Jahn, of No. 112 Wall street, and others, on a fraudulent warehouse receipt, setting forth that he had on storage 20 tierces of rice which had arrived per steamer Charleston. It was ascertained that Whitlock had no such property in store, whereupon he was arrested for attempting to negotiate a fraudulent receipt. The accused warehouseman was brought before Judge Gildersleeve, and committed to the Tombs in default of $1,500 bail.

A SCOUNDREL GOING HOME.

Deputy United States Marshal Newcome arrived in this City yesterday having in custody Isaac Rich, a Frenchman, for whose extradition the French Government has made a formal demand, and who was arrested by the Marshal at Wyanesborough, Va., a few days ago. The offender was in 1875 and during a portion of last year the principal of a charity school at a place called Elencourt, in the District of Morteeland, France. It is alleged that while holding this position he outraged a number of little girls, all of them under the age of 12 years. The knowledge of Rich's crimes coming to the ears of the authorities, an attempt was made to arrest him, but he evaded the officers and fled to this country. Arrived here, he proceeded to Waynesborough, where he purchased a small tract of land in the backwoods, erected a log shanty and took up his abode there—the place being 10 miles from any human habitation. It was in this out-of-the-way place that Marshal Newcome found him. On being arrested, he expressed his willingness to return to his native land and make a full confession of all his crimes. He is about 36 years of age, and is said to be a man of rare intelligence and ability. He was taken before United States Commissioner Kenneth G. White yesterday and was committed to Ludlow Street Jail. He will have a hearing next Monday.

ELEVEN STUBBORN MEN.

Moses Jacobi, alias Dr. Franklin, an alleged abortionist, doing business at No. 161 Bleecker street, was tried in the United States Circuit Court, before Judge Benedict, yesterday on a charge of sending obscene literature through the mails. The jury, after having been out two hours, stated that they could not agree, and were therefore discharged. It was another case of eleven stubborn men, the poll standing 11 for conviction and one for acquittal.

ALBANY, Feb. 1.—The following is the Court of Appeals day calendar for Friday, Feb. 2: Nos. 191, 192, 131, 133, 142, 122, 141, 171.

In the Court of Appeals, Thursday, Feb. 1: No. 146—Herzel vs. Barber; argument resumed and concluded. No. 164—Tuska vs. O'Brien; argued by Erastus Cook for appellant, and A. J. Vanderpoel for respondent.

DECISIONS.

SUPREME COURT—CHAMBERS.

By Judge Lawrence.

The Marine Bank of Chicago vs. Van Brunt.—In the case in 49 N. Y. P., Nos. 160 and 161, although it is stated that on execution issued in the life-time of the judgment debtor, it does not appear that the Court of Appeals laid any stress upon that fact in arriving at their decision. Judge Allen in his opinion says, "but an execution cannot issue without the order of both tribunals." And again, "the act of 1850 is not in conflict with the provisions of the Code, or inconsistent with the remedy given by it, but is cumulative and adds another restraint to those already existing." I can find nothing in his opinion which indicates that the issuing of an execution during the life time of the debtor and its return unsatisfied would render an application for leave to issue execution immediately after his death. In obedience to this decision I am constrained to grant the motion.

Aldis vs. Robinson.—The charge that the consent to refer was the result of collusion between the attorneys for the plaintiff and the defendant seems to me to be completely overthrown by the affidavits read in opposition to the motion. I do not feel inclined, therefore, to disturb the order of reference. The plaintiff does not show how he will be injured by a reference, nor that the case is one which it is not proper to refer. Even if the order of reference is vacated or granted by default, if there is any reason why such commission should not issue, the plaintiff is entitled to prevent it. He may, therefore, move to vacate the order on the affidavits filed before. Motion to vacate the order of reference is denied.

Wilcox vs. Fitch, &c. vs. The Mason Manufacturing Company.—Motion denied, but with leave to renew on further affidavits if the plaintiff shall be so advised. See memorandum.

McKeon vs. Green.—Motion granted, provided that the motion be argued when reached at the March General Term. See memorandum.

Matter of Durfee, &c.—The report of the Referee seems to me to be right and should be confirmed. In respect to the lands at New-Bed

The two houses of Congress began their work of counting the Electoral votes yesterday. The proceedings were neither interesting nor picturesque, somewhat to the surprise apparently of the privileged crowd who were permitted to witness them. No objections were made till the vote of Florida was reached, when three sets of returns were presented, and were duly handed over to the Electoral Commission for examination and decision. Argument on these will begin to-day, and will last through to-morrow's session. The country may fairly expect to learn early next week by what principle the vote of Florida is to be tested, and, therefore, what disposition will be made of the entire mass of returns and evidence from the disputed States.

Speaker RANDALL selected both of the tellers on the part of the House from the Democratic side, and thereby gave another example of the narrow-minded partisanship and the sinister motives which his party bring to the "compromise" solution of the Presidential problem. The two Democratic tellers appear to be the survival of a plan matured during the ante-compromise period, which contemplated the presentation of a count of votes to the House which should essentially differ from that announced by the President of the Senate, and which might be used as a pretext for the inauguration of TILDEN. Mr. RANDALL and his associates are evidently not aware that we have entered upon an era of good feeling, or at least they are disposed to cling to their ideal of the political millennium as the time when the Democratic leopard shall lie down with the Republican kid inside.

The Senate Committee on Privileges and Elections have made their report on the Presidential Electors alleged to have been ineligible at the time of their election. They find that WILLIAMSON, of New-Jersey, was disqualified from acting as a member of the Electoral College, but that the vacancy caused by his non-attendance was legally filled by his associates. FROST, of Missouri, is also declared to have been ineligible, and the attempt to fill the vacancy caused by his absence from the meeting of the College was illegal and void under the laws of the State. HOLLIDAY, of Virginia, was likewise found to have been disqualified, but the vacancy in his case was legally filled. The Oregon case is not reported on, as it belongs to another committee, but it is pointed out that an application of the doctrine set up by Gov. GROVER to the cases of FROST and HOLLIDAY would render the Republican candidates who ran in opposition to them entitled to the Governor's certificate. The net result of the report is that one of the Electoral votes cast by Missouri for TILDEN and HENDRICKS is clearly illegal—that the State did, in fact, contribute but fourteen votes for the Democratic candidates.

Bills for the reform of the City Government are pouring in upon the Legislature. The three bills introduced in the Senate by Mr. WOODIN on Wednesday for the retrenchment of the exorbitant fees of the County Clerk, Register, and Coroners are samples of the best and most clearly defensible kind. Some others have been introduced in the Assembly of obviously good intent, but whose provisions have already been embodied in the comprehensive bill presented by Mr. FISH. This last measure was somewhat emasculated before its introduction, evidently to please the Police Commissioners, and there is, of course, no guarantee that it will not emerge from committee still further shorn of some of its most salutary provisions. It will probably retain, however, the principle which Mr. LANGBEIN has made the subject of a separate bill, that no clerk, attorney, or other person in the employ of the City of New-York shall be appointed Receiver or Referee in any action before the courts. Such a provision is needed to break up a ring of court clerks, whose relationships with some of the Judges have been the means of yielding them large incomes in the shape of fees from references and receiverships.

The streets have become quagmires of pasty mud, and the sidewalks and crossings are covered with a sloppy mixture which is about equally destructive of public health and public clothing. And yet we are taxed $2,000 a day for cleaning the streets, and have had clear and Spring-like weather for the last eight or ten days. We are frequently reminded that the City would be well governed if only the Legislature would leave it alone and allow the noble principles of local self-government and direct official responsibility to assert their power. But who thinks of calling the Police Commissioners to account for their notorious maladministration of street-cleaning funds? Certainly, not Mayor ELY, whose business it is supposed to be, nor the Board of Aldermen, who have the power to do so, nor any five citizens who are tax-payers, and who, under the charter, can procure the summary examination of any public officer before a Judge of the Supreme Court. Unless the Legislature can relieve us of the set of incompetent jobbers who, by the grace of that arch-intriguer Gov. TILDEN, became Police Commissioners, it is tolerably clear that "local self-government" will not rid us of the load.

THE GOLDEN OPPORTUNITY.

The impression prevails at Washington that this Congress will do nothing toward securing a currency constantly redeemable in coin, though that is now plainly within reach. But why should it not do so? There is no reason in the interests of the country for refusing to take the simple step which would accomplish this end. Apparently, too, there is no reason of political expediency. The question of inflation and contraction as an issue in national politics may be said to have passed out of sight, for the time being, during the last Presidential campaign. The course of the Democratic Party was so equivocal and confusing that neither the inflationists nor the hard-money men cared to give prominence to the currency question. The former had accepted a nominally hard-money candidate; the latter had consented to stand on a dubious platform which was strongest on the inflation side. No one had any motive for bringing forward the financial issue. In a somewhat similar way, the Republican platform was not unmistakably distinct, and Mr. HAYES' letter was stronger than the platform. The soft-money Republicans consoled themselves with their own construction of the platform, and the hard-money men took comfort from the views of their candidate. But the issue was not made up clearly in the public mind, and other things easily threw it into the shade.

Why should any member of Congress, no matter what his views have been, object to seeing the financial issue permanently got out of politics? That can now be done easily. All that is necessary is a law for funding legal tenders. The legal-tender notes yesterday rose to within 4.65 per cent. of the value of gold, the price of the latter in paper being quoted at 104⅞. The impulse which would be given by a simple funding law, would now, beyond any reasonable question, carry the notes to par, and the operation of such a law would keep them permanently equal to gold. The financial question, in the form in which it has vexed the country for so many years, would then be settled. We repeat, why should this result not be acceptable to all parties? The "greenback" issue has never been of the slightest political advantage to any party. It has provoked dissensions and quarrels, and brought into prominence empty-headed demagogues without real weight, reputation, or force of character, wherever it has attracted much attention. It has demoralized the masses and brought perplexity and confusion to party leaders. Who can say, for instance, that the notion of "paying" the bonds in greenbacks in 1868 was not an unmixed evil to the Democracy? Who of their own leaders, in his sober senses, does not now believe that the wild heresies regarding inflation in Ohio and Pennsylvania in 1875, and their repetition in 1876, gave the party a load to carry without which it might have stood in no need of extra-constitutional devices to help it to the Presidency? As for the Republican leaders, the weak spot in the armor of some who were justly distinguished during the war, and who were capable of maintaining a good record, has been their error regarding paper money.

It now happens that largely by the working of forces wholly outside the law, the knotty points in the financial question have been settled. The law of 1875 was a very mild measure. It made a promise of resumption in 1879, and then it gave the banks the choice of greater or less issues, at their discretion. That was all that was really effective in it, for the provision for withdrawing 80 per cent. of legal tenders against any new bank issues has in practice amounted to little. The result is that, without any distinct provision for contraction, a large amount of currency has been withdrawn because it could not be kept out with any profit. Prices, following in our country the tendency prevailing throughout the world, have fallen. Large ventures in the use of capital have, in all commercial countries, been avoided, or made with great caution. The demand for currency, which had been unduly excited, has fallen away. At the same time, by a peculiar fortune, we have made large export crops and had a good sale for them. By a forced economy at home, we have lessened our purchases abroad. A very large part of our debt to Europe has been paid, and for some time payments have set in the opposite direction. The credit of the Government has advanced steadily, until now its bonds stand higher in the markets of the world than they have done in nearly a score of years, and its demand notes bear a discount of less than five per cent., and are steadily advancing. There is no longer a question of contraction, or of any positive action on the part of the Government. There is only the question of securing the enormous advantage we have gained, of nailing the splendid bargain with fortune which is happily and rather unexpectedly offered to us.

A funding law, in the opinion of all observers, would now make our paper worth as much, dollar for dollar, as gold, and it would silently, easily, without jar or friction, keep it at that point. The actual increase of the funded debt thus produced would be insignificant. At the outside, it would not exceed fifty millions, and would add but two millions a year to our interest charge. The firm support given by such a measure to our national credit would enable us to refund our six per cents. at a rapid rate, and the disposal of the remaining $230,000,000 of the 4½ per cents would, of itself, save $3,450,000 annually; probably twice as much as the funding of the legal tenders would cost. Never was a Government offered a more brilliant opportunity to escape from a situation which is wholly bad, and to permanently establish a sound and advantageous policy. If the present Congress is blind to this opportunity and the great duty which it carries with it, we hope that the next President, whoever he may be, will promptly call the Forty-fifth Congress in extra session, in order that it may do the work. Whatever awaits the country in the way of political experience during the next four years, it would be a great gain if it could now secure a sound and stable currency.

DISTRUST OF CORPORATE MANAGEMENT.

One of the most formidable obstacles to a revival of financial and business confidence is the almost universal distrust of the management of great companies and of a certain class of financial institutions. The distrust is the more serious because it is reasonable. A senseless panic will wear itself out. Sweeping accusations based upon exceptional wrong seldom do much mischief. But when, as in this case, the doubts that prevail are the result of an experience too recent to be explained away, and too widely injurious to be attributed to accidental causes, their frank recognition is the first step toward improvement. There can be no great increase of trust in corporate property as an investment until its management acquire conditions and characteristics now rarely found.

Scarcely a day passes in Wall street which does not illustrate the depth and force of the suspicions which exist. The condition of the "street," the deadness of its market, the paralysis of nearly all branches of its business, could not have been possible except in a period of intense distrust. There are no outside operators because the market is essentially a brokers' market. There is no disposition to invest funds which are only nominally productive in undertakings which in ordinary circumstances would seem to be remunerative, because there is no faith in the influences which control them. The old reliance upon the literal accuracy of published statements is gone. The old relations between directors and stockholders, between managers and the public, exist no longer. The managerial art consists chiefly in hiding the facts of an unpleasant situation. The power incident to a directorship is used most frequently for the furtherance of interests in which the constituents, the shareholders, have no concern whatever—which, indeed, are often antagonistic to the shareholders' interests, and have been cultivated without reference to their judgment or their wishes.

The last forty-eight hours have shown the working of this state of things in the case of the New-Jersey Central Railroad. Its melancholy history we need not recapitulate. It has within a few months fallen from a condition of great apparent prosperity to one of partial helplessness. A tumble from 110 to 21 would not have been possible had the main body of the stockholders, or a small percentage of the investing public, placed any reliance upon the reiterated assurances of those in authority. From an investment security, the stock has sunk until it has become the sport of "bulls" and "bears," and is withal so beset with elements of uncertainty that any real value it retains is unknown. No report respecting it is too prejudicial to be believed. With something like fatuity, the Directors and officers pursue a course the least of all likely to produce improvement. They held a secret meeting with a limited number of shareholders, to whom, we must suppose, some explanation of affairs was given. The presumption is that the explanation was not favorable or it would not have been confined to a hole-and-corner meeting. What was done is only matter of conjecture. Rose-colored stories were put into circulation for the benefit of the "bulls;" but already they are discredited, and the position of the company is not much better than before. Whether wealthy shareholders agreed to take certificates of indebtedness to an amount sufficient to extricate the company from immediate difficulties, or whether the aid rendered was no more than a loan to prevent default on the first mortgage bonds, is, for the general purposes of an argument, immaterial. The noteworthy fact is, that the former management of the company was fatal to trust, and that the new management, instead of taking the whole body of shareholders into its confidence, persists in the same unwise policy. The natural consequence is seen in the weakness of the company's credit, and the readiness to accept the worst rumors in regard to its affairs.

Similar in essence, though different in degree, is the position of the two other corporations which lost the public confidence simultaneously with the New-Jersey Central Road. It would be unjust to the Delaware, Lackawanna and Western and the Delaware and Hudson to classify them with the New-Jersey Central. Their embarrassments are lighter, their properties more valuable. On the other hand, the policy which brought ruin to the New-Jersey Central was also, to a greater or less extent, their policy. Their stocks, months ago, ceased to be available for investment. Their condition is suspected; their future is talked of with misgivings. If their managers are to be believed, so unfavorable an estimate is not warranted by facts. Their difficulties, we are told, are merely temporary, and are incident to a period of depression, while the inherent strength of the companies forbids aught worse than has already occurred. Had these assurances been accompanied with statements so full and clear that there could be no denying them, the progress of distrust might have been checked. But the published explanations themselves need to be explained. They reveal only part of a complicated story. Of course, the Directors and officers plead their personal standing as proof that nothing dishonorable or disastrous remains behind. There was a time when the plea would have been accepted as conclusive, but it is not now. Faith of that sort has vanished. And these enterprises will continue discredited until their managers acknowledge the right of the holders of their securities, and the public generally, to a full knowledge of the truth.

If we select the coal companies as examples of the manner in which financial difficulties are aggravated by the reticence or evasiveness of their managers, it is because they happen to be the most conspicuous in the affairs of Wall street. But the moral they teach extends to other companies, as well those whose present condition is one of comparative prosperity as those which still lie half hidden amid the wrecks of 1873. The concentration of stocks in few hands is to the management an element of immense power, but it is not necessarily a guarantee against the corroding effects of popular distrust. Prudent investors are shy of corporations in which they are practically voiceless. They are not quite sure of statements whose verification is beyond their reach. If this feeling applies to companies of unusual strength, its influence in relation to companies which now pay a diminished dividend, or no dividend at all, or which are still struggling with the holders of defaulted bonds—is irresistible. Take the Illinois Central as the type of the first class and the Michigan Central as the type of the second, and we have evidence of a decline quite as notable, and quite as suggestive, as that of the Delaware and Hudson. As for the bankrupt roads, there can be no help for them until confidence is restored in the integrity of corporate authority.

The want is as wide as this form of management. It extends to financial institutions not less than to railroads. In its effects upon business interests generally, the distrust is scarcely less injurious than are the abuses which account for its existence. The one thing needful for its cure is reform in corporate management. We must go back to seek sounder ideas of managerial duty; and, having found them, must insist upon their application in the direction of corporate affairs. The pride of a manager may be wounded when he is reminded that he is the servant of the corporation, whether it be a railroad, an insurance company, or a trust company; but until he realize this relationship he is not unlikely to misinterpret his functions and to pervert his power. Directors may shun as a lunatic a man who rises at a meeting, or avails himself of a seat at a board, to remind them that they are simply trustees for others, that they have no right to lock up secrets or to do anything not consistent with a fiduciary position; but unless they learn the lesson from somebody, and act upon it, they will look in vain for the unstinted confidence which is essential to a renewal of corporate prosperity.

PICKETT.

During the war between the United States and Mexico a wandering American of a commercial turn found his way to the seat of the Mexican Government. Sauntering into the halls of the Montezumas, as one may suppose, he crossed his legs, drew out his jack-knife and a piece of soft pine wood, and with a thin stream of saliva knocking over a fly at ten paces, he said to the Dictator, "Wal, Squire, how'll ye dicker? I'll settle this war for ye inside of thirty days; terms cash." The stranger was arrested for attempting to negotiate peace without authorization and on a money basis. He was sent through the lines to Gen. SCOTT, and thereafter cut no figure in history. What was his name and what his fate the chronicler of those times fails to record. We are persuaded that he was JOHN T. PICKETT. For JOHN T. PICKETT, according to his own autobiography given to DAVID DUDLEY FIELD'S (late KNOTT'S) committee, has led a checkered, eventful, and diplomatic career. PICKETT was a Brigadier General under KOSSUTH, a Major General under SANTA ANNA, a Minister Plenipotentiary "near the Government of Mexico" under JEFFERSON DAVIS, and at one time held a position of some sort by appointment of Gen. WALKER, when that gray-eyed man of destiny was filibustering in Nicaragua. He has also been in the United States consular service, was a Colonel in the Confederate Army, Chief of Staff to Gen. BRECKINRIDGE at various times; and, twenty-seven years ago, he "struck a blow for the independence of Cuba." When all was over and he felt that the Confederacy was no more, he gathered up the rebel archives and sold them to the United States Government for thirty-five thousand dollars. This soldier of fortune is very dear to the heart of Mr. DAVID DUDLEY FIELD.

The fertile genius of PICKETT perceived a glorious opportunity in what is popularly known as the Louisiana complication. He says that he, being a Democrat, believed that Louisiana had gone for TILDEN. But, as other men might not so believe, and as the returns were against his candidate, he beheld a new chance for putting an honest penny in his purse. To him then entered, as in the nick of time, an emissary—MADDOX by name—who was ready to help to complete a bargain by which the State should be secured for TILDEN for the trifling sum of one million dollars. There is nothing mean about PICKETT. He felt that he could secure the Louisiana Electoral vote for a much less sum. Indeed, he subsequently told Mr. ABRAM HEWITT that the thing could be done for $550,000. A cool half million was the "minimum pile" demanded for the vote, and the trifling sum of $50,000 was added as his own fee for conducting the negotiations. But he would not grind the faces of the poor; a round million he thought ought to be forthcoming. This honest gentleman says that his heart was wrung when he thought of forty millions of people about to be delivered over to another Republican Administration, and all for the want of a paltry million of dollars. The forty millions, he said, knew that TILDEN was elected, and would be woefully disappointed if he did not get the Electoral vote of Louisiana.

It seems that PICKETT met various Democratic statesmen who were much of his way of thinking. Mr. HEWITT, he says, approved of what he was doing, and said that if he (HEWITT) was in his (PICKETT'S) place he should do just what PICKETT was doing—go about the country to sell out the Electoral vote of Louisiana. To be sure, it does not appear that PICKETT could deliver the goods; but he expressly declares that if he could only get $50,000 he would be willing to "live in sackcloth and ashes" for the remainder of his days. It is understood that PICKETT'S ideas as to the value of sackcloth and ashes are more extravagant than those of most people. Moreover, in the Spartan virtue of his determination, he was willing to give the coveted $50,000 to the widows and orphans of the Confederacy, keeping only the penitential sackcloth and ashes for his own private use. The spectacle of this good man's selling eight Electoral votes for cash and giving his $50,000 fee to the widows and orphans, and spending the remainder of his days in sackcloth and ashes, is calculated to move the heart of the most callous politician.

JOHN MORRISSEY seems to have seen things in some such light. PICKETT says that this eminent statesman remarked that he would buy the eight Electoral votes as he would buy an equal number of pigs in open market. Mr. MORRISSEY, he says, thought it was quite right to pay a man for doing right, provided the man wouldn't do it without pay. But, of course, he who paid the money must decide whether the thing required was right or wrong. This is the statesmanlike view which Mr. TWEED used to take of legislation. If he believed that his little bill ought to pass, why should he not give a Senator a handsome check for voting for it, since he could not be made to do his duty in any other way? And, lest some censorious person should object to this line of argument on the part of Mr. MORRISSEY, the ingenuous PICKETT begs us to remark that the conversation "was held on Sunday, and that it was not in a bar-room." There is much virtue in a conclusion which is arrived at by two conferring statesmen who collogue on Sunday and elsewhere than in a bar-room.

So, armed with the approval of Messrs. MORRISSEY and HEWITT, the patriotic PICKETT felt that he could secure what he calls his "great object." This was to elect TILDEN at any reasonable expenditure of money, sackcloth, and ashes. The good man's heart mourned over forty millions of people, and he made it an inevitable condition in all negotiations that he should have control of "the manipulation." No intermediaries or agents for PICKETT. He must handle the cash, or the widows and orphans might go hungry. PICKETT, it may be observed, was not born yesterday. And when his confederate in New-Orleans telegraphed something about his (PICKETT'S) interest, he virtuously, but profanely, roared back over the wires, "D——n my interest. Think of the best interests of 40,000,000 of people." Mr. DAVID DUDLEY FIELD wept copiously when he read that dispatch. Nevertheless, Mr. PICKETT did not sell the Electoral vote of Louisiana. Mr. HEWITT did not think his price was too high, but he didn't believe he could deliver the goods.

A CHICAGO MIRACLE.

A year or two ago a Methodist minister with an unsatisfactory leg was suddenly cured of his lameness while attending a camp-meeting at Ocean Grove. This alleged miracle gave rise to a good deal of discussion at the time, the minister insisting that the joint prayers of two eloquent sisters had completely repaired his leg, while certain of his fellow-ministers claimed that he still perceptibly limped, and that hence his alleged cure, being imperfect, could not be regarded as a miracle. Whatever may have been the truth as to this affair, it has been entirely thrown into the shade by the recent cure of a paralytic Chicago lady, who, instead of a merely local leg difficulty, was suffering from inability to speak, eat, or walk, and who, without any extraneous aid, prayed herself entirely out of the house and into a neighbor's parlor, where she sang hymns with a determination to make up for lost time which cast a gloom over the entire neighborhood.

This interesting woman became paralyzed seven or eight years ago. Although her left side, with its appurtenances, was totally useless, she was able to move from room to room with crutches, though, of course, too slowly to overtake an active husband or a wary book agent. The worst misfortune was her inability to speak. Her jaws could only be opened, as she asserts, by prying them apart with a piece of cork an eighth of an inch wide—and it may be incidentally remarked that this is the first instance on record in which cork has been used as a crowbar. Of course, no woman could do justice to any subject by slowly filtering her remarks through an opening an eighth of an inch wide, and hence this remarkable person abstained during nearly eight years from all conversation. Naturally, she found great difficulty in eating, but her husband, who was quick to perceive the advantages of a wife who could neither go out shopping nor comment upon his faults, kept her alive with "nourishing liquids." It must have been truly pathetic to watch this devoted man administering "nourishing liquids" to his helpless wife with a teaspoon, and calmly ignoring her mute dissatisfaction with the quantity of sugar, or the quality of the lemon peel. Perhaps, if he could have foreseen the future he would have swallowed the nourishing fluids himself, procured a divorce, and married a wife from a deaf and dumb asylum furnished with a written guarantee of her incurability. But we can never know what may be the consequences of a kind act. Many a man has warmed a small boy in his bosom, only to have him grow up and blow a tin horn in his ears. Many an unmarried woman has cast Christmas slippers before her Pastor, who has subsequently turned and rended her holiest feelings by marrying some one else. We cannot tell what misery a single kind act may produce; and there are scores of men whose lives have been blasted by a thoughtless kind word spoken to a determined widow, thoroughly familiar with the sort of evidence that insures success in a breach-of-promise suit.

The complicated Chicago paralytic lady endured her sufferings with the resignation that is so beautiful in a woman who cannot lift a stove-lid or remark, "O! I'll let you know." Recently, however, it occurred to her to pray, and in spite of the fact that she was a confirmed resident of Chicago, she boldly knelt down and began her devotions. If it be possible to criticise her conduct in this particular without irreverence, it may be asked why a paralytic who could not sustain herself without crutches, should have thrown them aside and knelt? Still, we are obliged to accept the fact that she did kneel, for we have her solemn assertion to that effect.

Presently the devout lady heard a voice in the room, and felt a natural indignation at the irreverent interruption. The sound of the voice grew louder and louder, until it occurred to her to investigate her mouth and ascertain if it had any connection with the phenomenon. Having "put her hand right in between her teeth," she discovered that the voice in question was her own voice. She recognized it as soon as she touched it, and her delight on finding that she could speak was so great that she instantly sprang up and ran across the street to mention the matter to an intimate friend. As she was running she happened to notice that she was able to move without crutches, and this naturally added to her joy. That she demonstrated her recovery of her voice by violent singing was not to be wondered at, and it can hardly be doubted that she also illustrated her improved condition in point of legs by throwing a few graceful somersaults—although she abstains from mentioning this fact. A veil must be dropped over the subsequent meeting of husband and wife. There are griefs too sacred for comment, and we should respect the feelings of the man who returned to a once happy home to find his wife standing erect at the front door and overflowing with long-suppressed language. This is, in substance, the story told by the woman herself, and it would scarcely be worth repeating were it not that certain good people in Chicago, including at least one presumably intelligent minister of a reputable sect, insist that the woman has been the subject of a genuine miracle.

It may not be the province of a secular newspaper to decide upon the genuineness of an alleged Chicago miracle, but it is permissible to point out the consequences which the acceptance of the woman's story of her claim that her cure was miraculous involve. There is sufficient evidence to prove that so-called "magnetic healers" have apparently cured cases of paralysis by commanding the patient to throw away his crutches and walk. The Zouave JACOB certainly did this in several instances, and other quacks of equal impudence have been occasionally equally successful. Why should we refuse to accord these men the power of working miracles, if we grant that the prayer of a Chicago woman has wrought a miraculous cure? Or to make a closer parallel, there are well-authenticated cases of paralytics, or other invalids, who have been cured by praying at the shrine of some popular Roman Catholic saint. We cannot refuse to believe the miracles wrought at Lourdes if we believe the miracle wrought at Chicago. If the Chicago woman really was cured in the form and manner alleged, it is much simpler to assume that her paralysis was a form of hysteria, in which case her sudden cure was in no wise marvelous. To admit the truth of Methodist and Presbyterian miracles is to admit the truth of Roman Catholic miracles. If the Chicago Protestants who believe that a genuine miracle has been wrought in that city are prepared to make the latter admission, it is their own business, but they will find that in this matter there is, at this day, no stopping place between Rome and Reason.

OBITUARY.

EDWARD DYAS, COMEDIAN.

Mr. Edward Dyas, best known in this country as the father of the leading lady at Wallack's Theatre, died yesterday at his daughter's residence, in West Fourteenth street. Mr. Dyas had been confined to the house by illness for some weeks, and his decease was not unexpected. He was born in Birmingham, about 63 years since. In early life he was apprenticed to a silversmith and engraver, but a strong inclination for the stage speedily manifested itself, and before long, Mr. Dyas' name became familiar in the provinces. Later on, we believe, he appeared in London, and when his daughter was engaged to visit the United States, he accompanied her hither. He played at the Brooklyn Theatre, during a week of old comedy performances, and New-York theatre-goers will doubtless remember his personation of Sir Oliver in "The School for Scandal," in an amateur representation which occurred at the Lyceum a twelvemonth or so ago. Mr. Dyas was an actor of the old school, experienced, methodical, and precise.

At a special meeting of the Directory of the Lotos Club, yesterday, resolutions were passed expressive of regret for the death of Mr. Dyas, and appointing a committee of four to attend his funeral.

OBITUARY NOTES.

Mr. E. C. Rouse, President of the Sun Insurance Company, and a prominent citizen of Cleveland, Ohio, died yesterday morning.

Prof. Enos Stevens died at the family homestead at Barnet, Vt., on Wednesday, of heart disease. He was a brother of Mr. Henry Stevens, F. R. S., and Mr. B. T. Stevens, the United States Dispatch Agent at London, and of Mr. Simon Stevens, of New-York. Prof. Stevens was a cultured farmer and a strong writer on agricultural subjects. His Alderney stock took the first premium at the Vermont State Agricultural Fairs several times.

ART NOTES.

We understand that the coming annual exhibition of paintings at the Academy of Design will be especially attractive from the number of good pictures by artists comparatively little known to the public. The young men who have been profiting by foreign travel and the healthier atmosphere of art criticism abroad and at home, will, it is understood, furnish work quite out of the old routine of things. This is as it should be. The older painters will not be hurt by the pressing forward of the young; the latter will merely widen the circle of persons interested in art matters and improve the market for those already established in the favor of the public. Perhaps a sharper competition will spur some of the older men to put out their full strength, instead of wasting their talents on pictures which they suppose will be popular. It is easy to be a painter, but the way of an artist is hard.

THE WORK OF BOTH HOUSES.

A SPIRITED DEBATE ON A BILL AMENDING THE LAW OF CRIMINAL PROCEDURE—A PROPOSED COMMITTEE TO INVESTIGATE LIFE INSURANCE MATTERS—THE NEW CAPITOL BUILDING—MORRISSEY'S LOUISIANA PIGS.

From Our Own Correspondent.

ALBANY, Thursday, Feb. 1, 1877.

Nearly the whole morning session of the Assembly was consumed in an animated, and at times very heated, debate on a bill introduced by Mr. Peter Mitchell amendatory of the law of criminal procedure. It provides, in brief, that it shall not be lawful, on the trial of any person charged with a felony, "after a previous conviction for felony or petit larceny, to charge the jury to inquire concerning such previous conviction until after they shall have inquired concerning such subsequent offense, and shall have found such person guilty of the same; and whenever in any indictment such previous conviction shall be stated, the reading of such statement to the jury as part of the indictment shall be deferred until after such finding as aforesaid; provided, nevertheless, that if upon the trial of any person for any such subsequent offense as aforesaid, such person shall give evidence of his or her good character, it shall be lawful for the prosecution, in answer thereto, to give evidence of the indictment and conviction of such person for the previous offense, before such verdict of guilty shall have been returned, and the jury shall inquire concerning such previous conviction at the same time that they inquire concerning the subsequent offense." The speech of the debate was made by Mr. Ecclesine, who, in addition to his professional objections to the bill, has a personal animosity to its introducer, which infused into his speech a strong spice of sarcasm and contempt. He denounced the measure as one in the interest of the criminal classes, and drew a graphic picture of a criminal trial in New-York. He described the jury as composed of persons as nearly approaching idiocy as could be obtained; narrated the style in which the witnesses for the people and the defense were examined; the talented young attorney for the defense lifting his eyes to heaven imploring justice and mercy for his client, and pictured Johnny Smasher, the criminal, sitting with his mistress beside him in tears, she with one eye on the jury and the other fixed lovingly on the Judge. The House was kept in a constant roar of laughter. At the conclusion of Mr. Ecclesine's speech, nearly every legal gentleman in the House was ready and desirous to discuss the bill, and so various were the opinions expressed about it, and so many the amendments offered, that, finally, the bill was progressed, and in the House recommitted to the Judiciary Committee for further amendment.

The bill in relation to the office of Superintendent of Public Works was reported from the Canal Committee this morning, and on motion of Mr. Baker, the Chairman, was made the special order for next Monday evening.

The following resolutions were introduced this morning by Mr. Purdy, and were laid over under the rule. Mr. Purdy stated that they were supplementary to the resolutions recently introduced by Mr. Fish and adopted by the House:

Whereas, The recent failures of life insurance companies, and the disclosures attending thereon, have created much anxiety and alarm in the public mind respecting the solvency, business standing, and practices of life insurance companies doing business in this State, therefore,

Resolved, That a special committee of five be appointed, with power to send for persons and papers and to employ competent expert assistants to examine into the practices and condition of the life insurance companies authorized to do business in this State, and report to this House as soon as practicable what remedial legislation, if any, is necessary for the protection of the life insurance interests of the people.

Mr. Healy introduced his bill abolishing the Dock Department. It provides for a Superintendent of Docks to be appointed by the Mayor, expenditures to be made under the sanction of the Board of Apportionment.

An important bill in reference to life insurance companies was introduced by Mr. Grady, prohibiting the using of proxies at elections of officers, unless such proxies have been executed within three months of the time of such election; also giving policy-holders an equal voice in such elections with stockholders.

Mr. Langbein introduced a bill abolishing the requirement of confirmation by the Board of Aldermen of nominations made for heads of departments by the Mayor.

THE SENATE.

The Senate occupied most of the session to-day discussing the joint resolution reported from the Assembly Ways and Means Committee, and adopted in the lower house, directing the stoppage of any further work on the modified plan of the new Capitol building until the Legislature decided whether the plan should be carried out. A strong bias was shown in the discussion in favor of stopping further work on the building under any plan. A majority of the Senate are evidently opposed to completing the building on the modified plan adopted by the Capitol Commission last June, and it would not be a surprise if, when the question of appropriating more money comes up, a majority should be found in favor of abandoning the work altogether until the State is better able to complete the building. The House resolution was concurred in by a vote of 20 to 11.

Mr. Loomis introduced a bill imposing a fine of $100 per day for every day that any private banker or broker shall "place over or upon his office or place of business, or upon or in any pass-book, check, draft, certificate or deposit, or other paper, the name of any county, town, city, village, hill, valley, river, lake, or any other name or device by which the public may be led to infer that the banking business of such person, partnership, or association is being conducted by a person or persons duly authorized to act as bankers, organized under the laws of the United States, or under the acts of this State authorizing the formation of banking companies."

Senator Bixby made a personal explanation to the effect that he did not mean to say yesterday that the Insurance Committee had neglected to report any bill introduced by him, but what he did say was that a resolution offered by him last year, and sent to that committee, instructing it to investigate during the recess, and report to the present Legislature on the subject of the organization of life insurance companies, had not been complied with by that committee. In answer to this complaint the committee say that the resolution referred to did not pass the Senate, and, therefore, they were not invested with any authority in the premises.

Senator Morrissey, in answer to inquiries relative to the conversation which Pickett testifies he had with him last Fall about purchasing Louisiana pigs, says that Pickett's report of the interview is in the main correct, but he (Morrissey) wishes it to be distinctly understood that he never expressed a willingness to buy anybody to do anything that was not "exactly right." Whether it is usual for men to demand $1,000,000 for doing "exactly right," is a conundrum that Mr. Morrissey has not yet solved in his own mind.

ALBANY TOPICS.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

ALBANY, Feb. 1.—The Committee on Ways and Means had a hearing this afternoon on Mr. Cowdin's bill for reducing the taxation of banks. Mr. George S. Coe, President of the American Exchange Bank, argued in favor of the bill at considerable length, and the President of the Merchants' Exchange National Bank also spoke on the same side. The committee took no action on the bill.

Senator Bixby will introduce a bill to-morrow to prevent the fraudulent amalgamation of insurance companies. It stops the transfer of policies in bulk by providing that hereafter the company which reinsures shall reinsure the policy-holders individually. The bill also prohibits the reinsurance of any policy in another company after it has been six months on the books of the original company.

The Committee on Cities devoted the afternoon to the consideration of Mr. Bradley's bill for reducing the salaries of city officers in Brooklyn. The committee seem favorably inclined to the measure, and will probably report it favorably. Mr. McGroarty appeared in opposition to it.

Mr. James S. Graham, the "Labor Reformer" from Monroe, did not offer any more resolutions to-day for warming and ventilating the Assembly chamber at an expense of several thousand dollars. It is safe to say that he will not in the future, and it is further safe to say that the Legislature is not likely to be troubled to vote down any more jobbing resolutions emanating from the same source. The gentleman will learn that only men of integrity and character can afford to attract a large degree of public attention to their acts, and it is needless to say that men of integrity and character have not of late years, at least, been in the habit of offering such resolutions as the Monroe gentleman offered, and which the House so very decidedly voted down.

NEW-JERSEY LEGISLATURE.

A DEMOCRATIC OFFICIAL DISCHARGED—A BILL REQUIRING THE PAYMENT OF LABORERS IN MONEY.

TRENTON, Thursday, Feb. 1, 1877.

The House had a long and lively discussion this morning over the action of the Engrossed Bills Committee in employing the brother of ex-Speaker Vanderbilt to act as clerk for the committee before they had the consent of the House to employ a clerk. The committee were, on Mr. Griggs' motion, ordered to discharge him forthwith. The rest of the business of the House was confined to the reception of three bills. One from Mr. Paxton is designed to regulate the time of holding elections for towns and townships; another, from Mr. Tilden, requires Justices of the Peace to try cases in the district for which they shall have been elected.

A bill presented by Mr. Payne for the better securing of wages to workmen and laborers in the State of New-Jersey, reached its second reading in the House to-day. In all parts of the State, and particularly in the mining districts, employers have for some time been in the habit of compelling their employes to take their pay in orders on grocerymen for coal, wood, and victuals. The storekeepers on whom the orders are presented charge exorbitantly for the goods supplied; and it has even been said that in some places the men giving the orders and the storekeepers who honor them divide the profits extorted from the purchasers. Mr. Payne's bill is designed to stop that kind of swindling, and it declares that no ironmaster, foundryman, collier, factoryman, employer, or company, their agents or clerks, shall pay the wages of workmen in orders on any storekeeper, under penalty or forfeiting the amount of the order, and an additional penalty of conviction for misdemeanor followed by $500 fine, or six months' imprisonment, or both.

The House has adjourned till Monday evening.

RUSSIAN WIVES.

A story has been going the round of the French papers which, if it had any truth in it, would show that the atrocity of the Russian, like the charity of some less holy Christians, begins very much at home. The excuse for believing in the tale is to be found in the supposed fact that its truth was proved in a court of justice by the woman who acted as the heroine in it. This simple woman seems to have imagined that she might get from a Russian magistrate some sort of protection against a husband whose favorite pastime it was cruelly to torture her. She had been yoked by her playful husband to the shafts of his cart, and driven along for 16 versts, in double harness with the horse, under the furious blows of a heavy whip. Having survived this ordeal, she was brought home again, her head was shaved, and after she had been smeared all over with tar she was rolled in feathers and then turned out of the house. In this plight she resorted to the person whom she fondly imagined to be most benevolent, or at any rate the least savage, in the village. She went to the priest, but instead of obtaining an shelter or relief was rudely struck by the pious man, who called the husband and advised him to administer fresh castigation. It would have been well for the woman if she had taken the broad hint afforded her by this reception at the Pope's residence, and had returned home to suffer in silence the torments to which she was fated. But she was ignorant of Russian law, and she could not persuade herself that she was utterly without remedy in such a case as this. So she went to law, and brought before the court both the husband and the Pope. Here the Procurator General at once declined to enter into any argument on the subject of the husband's complaining that the whole matter was one of merely private family interest, and that husband and wife could always come to an understanding among themselves without the interference of the law. The priest's case was a little more difficult. But the worthy man represented that facts of this sort "occur often and inevitably among the lower orders" in Russia, whereupon the court without further discussion acquitted both the accused persons.

THE BOY AND THE PANTHER.

The Colusa (Cal.) Sun of Jan. 20, tells the following story: "Last Saturday Master John Williams, aged 13, was out hunting near home, on Elk creek, when he ran across a panther and gave him the benefit of the contents of his rifle. The panther made off, and the young man loaded up again and gave him chase, getting in another shot on him. This time, however, the panther got out of his sight, but he could see from the blood that he had been hit. He went home and dreamed all night, of course, of fighting panthers with a grizzly or two thrown in to make it interesting. Next morning, bright and early, he gathered his gun, determined on finding that panther. He got on the blood, which he traced into a hollow log. He fired into the log, and there got an ax and cut the panther out, finding him still alive, but he finished him up and dragged his trophy in triumph home. An inspection showed that both balls of the previous evening had gone through the panther's lungs. He was an immense fellow, measuring seven feet from tip to tip."

HAMPTON'S SELECTIONS.

The Columbia (S. C.) Union Herald says: "We have looked over the names of the so-called appointments of Gen. Hampton and confess that we see nothing in those names, or the men who bear them, that would give any guarantee that our public affairs would be better administered than they now are by Republican officials. Most of the appointees are the same old bankrupt, broken down, gilt-edge aristocracy of other days. Some are positively bad, one appointed County Auditor so notoriously bad that even ex-Gov. Moses would not have dared to make such an appointment, but he did contribute to his appointment to the extent of pardoning him from the penitentiary. In those lists of names proposed for public office we see none that will compare for integrity, business capacity, and honorable motives with Republican officials here in our own city."

POISON IN THE CLAM-POT.

The Springfield (Mass.) Republican says: "Some of the saloon-keepers in Westfield have recently given their patrons a free clam-chowder every Saturday evening, but it is quite likely the fashion will now die out for want of consumers, since Richard Burke, a married man, aged 25, partook of one Saturday night, and, after going home, was taken with convulsions, dying ten hours after. Two other men who ate of the chowder also had severe convulsions, but will recover, and it is said yet others had similar experience. It is not known what was in the compound to so seriously affect the men, some thinking it was copperas in the kettle, while others incline to the opinion that the trouble was in the clams. At all events, none but the hungriest and most case-hardened tramp will dare eat Westfield free clam-chowder for the present."

KILLED BY A BALE OF HAY.

BOSTON, Feb. 1.—Thomas Dolan, a well-known contractor, residing at No. 45 Adams street, was killed in his stable this evening by a bale of hay falling upon him.

FOR THE SAKE OF CHARITY.

A NIGHT'S SPORT AT THE ACADEMY.

A BRILLIANT COMPANY AT THE GREAT CHARITY BALL—SCENES INSIDE AND OUTSIDE OF THE ACADEMY—THE DISTINGUISHED GUESTS AND THOSE WHO OCCUPIED BOXES—A WORTHY FINANCIAL SUCCESS.

The times must be hard indeed when the annual appeal to New-York to pour out its wealth for the benefit of the Nursery and Child's Hospital is not answered with a lavish response. Years come and years go, with varying prosperity to merchant princes and financial kings, but when the early days of February approach business stringency and political complications are forgotten, and hands are plunged deep into purses that had been but now closed up against the demands of sluggish trade, and money is showered magnificently at the bidding of charity. The Charity Ball has truly become an institution in the midst of the Metropolis, and it was maintained last night with all the splendor of dress and all the character of personal prestige which the attendance of representative ladies and gentlemen of New-York society have contributed heretofore to make it notable. Before noon yesterday all the boxes had been sold, and the lady managers were well assured that financially the ball would be eminently successful. The preparations were all conducted under the direction of Mr. Theodore Moss, and the event proved that the business had been intrusted to competent and skillful hands. Outside the Academy of Music the scene from 8 o'clock until long past midnight was a brilliant one. The sky was clear and bright, so that the mud in the street, which ball-goers could laugh at, was quite forgotten. The Police were on duty in large numbers, under the command of Capt. Eakins, of the Eighteenth, and Capt. Welsh, and they kept back the crowds of curious and admiring spectators who congregated to watch the carriages as they dashed up to the main entrance and set down their loads of superbly-dressed women. A calcium light on Fourteenth street, opposite to Irving place, shed a brilliant glare over the densely-packed throng of spectators and the lines of moving carriages. Inside the Academy the scene recalled many a Charity Ball of days gone by. There were few decorations. The money of the lady managers is never laid out in extravagant adornments of the ball-room. At the rear of the stage a set-piece of scenery was arranged representing a canopy, and beneath this, in a sort of pavilion, were seats upon a raised platform for the managers. Midway up the centre aisle was the word "charity" in characters of flame, and just in the centre of the stage was a curiously wrought silvered fountain, from which leaped feathery sprays of delicate perfumes. Around the floor, on a line with the parquette, were large vases of choice flowers, which loaded the air with their fragrance. The company began to arrive as early as 8:30 o'clock, at which time there was a line of carriages extending from the entrance of the Academy through Fifteenth street to Third avenue, and as far up town as Thirtieth street. By 9 o'clock, although the lobbies and the dressing-rooms were filled, there were few occupants of the boxes, and but half a dozen guests were distributed about in the dress circle, so slowly did the company make their way to the ball-room. As 10 o'clock approached the throng became greater at the doors, and the tiers of boxes grew radiant with groups of ladies in elegant and varied costumes, while groups of gentlemen in suits of conventional black gathered in the aisles, about the doorways, and up and down the capacious lobbies. Soon after 10 o'clock a gentle stir was perceptible among the increasing throng, and the members of the Floor Committee were seen hurrying hither and thither preparatory to forming the inaugural march. Aloft in the amphitheatre the band ushered in the ball with Suppé's overture, "Morning, Noon, and Night," and the hum of conversation in the boxes became more general and louder. At 10:30 o'clock the boxes were about half filled, but the crowd at the door was large enough to promise that there would be no lack of guests when the dancing began.

At 10:30 the guests began to form in line in the corridor, and at 10:45, to the strains of Wagner's "Tannhauser" the grand entrée was made. The promenade was led by Arthur Leary, President of the association, who was accompanied by Mrs. Cooper. They were followed by Clarence Seward and Mrs. Arthur Gilman, T. Q. Hill and Mrs. R. S. L. Townsend, Edward Cooper and Mrs. Charles C. Perkins, Algernon S. Sullivan and Mrs. John C. Fremont, George Cooper and Mrs. A. S. Hewitt, Edward Delafield, Jr., and Miss Hewitt, Mr. Fitch and Mrs. Julian James, Mr. Archibald (British Consul) and Miss Archibald, Charles F. McLean and Miss Susie Tilden, Capt. John Haughton and Mrs. George B. Robinson, Frank Fremont and Miss Townsend, Commodore William H. McVicker and Miss Mary Redmond, Judge John R. Brady and Mrs. Thomas B. Musgrave, Erastus Brooks and Mrs. Luling, Dudley K. Phelps and Miss Mamie Phelps, Gen. Kiddoo and Mrs. Neftel, Dr. J. J. Hull and Miss Leavy, Judge John Sedgwick and Miss Sedgwick, followed by the general company. During the opening march the ball-room presented a splendid appearance, and certainly never looked better, the edges of the platform as far as the eye could reach being fringed with richly-dressed ladies, who followed the movements of the figures on the floor with unmistakable interest. The ball was opened by Mr. Arthur Leary and Miss Cooper, who took the lead in the first quadrille. The company had not yet apparently made up their minds to commence dancing, and only six sets were on the floor when the cornet sounded the preliminary note. All formality soon disappeared, however, under the influence of increased numbers, and when the waltz, which stood second on the programme, had been reached, the floor was filled. The company continued to arrive until 11:30, and the Academy, while not uncomfortably crowded, was well filled.

Among the general company were the following: Mayor Ely, ex-Mayor Wickham and lady, J. P. Giraud Foster, Mr. and Mrs. S. L. M. Barlow, Collector Arthur, Mrs. Bainbridge, S. Clark and Miss Jennie Clark, Mr. Garguilo, of the Greek Consulate, and Mrs. Henry Vail, Mrs. Algernon S. Sullivan, Mrs. Richard Townsend, Mrs. Frederick Stevens and party, Mr. and Mrs. Clarence Seward and the Misses Seward, Royal Phelps and the Misses Carroll, daughters of Gov. Carroll, of Maryland; Mrs. and the Misses Gurnee, Emigration Commissioner Forrest and lady, Jules Brugiere and lady, J. Dupignac and Mrs. Dupignac, Arthur Connolly and Miss Alice Barrow, George Law, Jr., and Miss Hastings, Commodore W.C. Langley, Stephenson, Jr., Dr. Montrose Pellel, Mrs. John Bigelow, Mrs. C. V. B. Ostlander, Mr. Bierstadt, Col. Dickinson Woodruff, Mrs. George Place, William Ridgeway Moore, Edward Ouiont, Duncan Wood, Halsey Haight, Mrs. Faran Stevens, Mrs. Train, Mr. Eli Perkins, Mrs. Largey, Mr. and Mrs. Aaronson, Albert Weber, H. C. Kelsey, (Secretary of State of New-Jersey, and wife, S. Abecasis, Mrs. D. F. Appleton, Mrs. Clarence G. Dinsmore, Mrs. Townsend Burden, Dr. Marion Simms, Col. and Mrs. Rush C. Hawkins, Allen Thorndyke Rice, Mr. Cleudennin, Thomas S. Brennan, Commissioner of Charities and Correction; Townsend Cox, Commissioner of Charities and Correction; Mrs. Henry L. Burnett, Mr. and Mrs. Paul Balnord, Mr. and Mrs. A. B. Cornell, Mrs. James H. Gerard, John T. Hoffman, Mrs. Hoffman, Mrs. Pellew, Mrs. Rutherford Stuyvesant, Dr. W. A. Hammond, E. A. Quintard, Richard Schell, George K. Sistare, Mr. and Mrs. Charles E. Whitehead, C. Du Bois Wagstaff, Theodore B. Woolsey, Mrs. Clarence S. Day, Mrs. Chester Griswold, and the following members of the Old Guard: Capt. J. E. Bagley, Lieut. J. W. Aspell, Gen. Joseph Navior, Lieut. Col. George De Witt, Treasurer Charles Childs.

THE COSTUMES.

The toilets of the ladies were exceedingly rich, and decidedly more elegant than anything seen so far during the season. Tarletons, grenadines, and other light fabrics were almost entirely discarded by the younger ladies, who, as a rule, wore soft, light-colored silks and satins cut décolleté, and heavily trained. Trimmings of flowers, lace, and swan's down were worn in profusion on everything, and were almost exclusively adopted as head-dresses. Very little jewelry was worn, and those who did indulge in that style of personal adornment generally selected diamonds. The elder ladies wore dark silks and satins, or rich velvet robes of black, ruby, and purple, elaborately trimmed with white and black lace, and feathers. With those splendid costumes were worn head-dresses of flowers and feathers with diamond ornaments.

THE BOXES.

Rarely, if ever, have the boxes of the Academy been in greater demand than for the Charity Ball of 1877. Not only did the choice locations bring large prices, but the less favored ones were disposed of at figures entirely satisfactory to the management. This spirited competition was undoubtedly due in a great measure to the discontinuance of the Lafayette Asylum and other rival balls, and the consequent fact that the charity was the only fashionable ball of the season. The profits realized from the sale of boxes more than covered all expenses, so that the proceeds of the sale of tickets, which probably net $14,000 or $15,000, can be devoted entirely to the Nursery and Child's Hospital. The boxes presented a magnificent appearance, occupied as they were by superbly-attired ladies, representing the leading families of the City. The different tiers looked like parterres of animated flowers, embracing every conceivable tint of color. The following were the occupants of the boxes:

Until long past midnight, set after set formed, with the floor well occupied, and each time the sets appeared to bring forth a new and brighter array of exquisite costumes. The ball began, progressed, and ended with smoothness and happy success, and the lady managers will congratulate each other upon a success quite as satisfactory as any that has ever attended similar efforts to promote the charity in behalf of which they were enlisted. There were at the time the Academy was most thronged not far from 5,000 persons in the house—upon the floor and in the balcony and boxes. The dance music was supplied by Lander, while Gratulla's Band played the promenade pieces.

THE FRENCH ARTIST DIAZ.

AN ILLUSTRIOUS LAND-CAPE PAINTER—HIS PRIVATE COLLECTION TO BE SOLD AT AUCTION.

From Galignani's Messenger.

On the 18th of November last Diaz died at Menton. France lost in him one of her most illustrious landscape painters; one of those for whom, as the brilliant generation of 1830 gradually disappears, she shows more admiration and sympathy. Diaz was popular; the public liked him; and, what was better, always recognized his works among a crowd of others. From the outset it had freely received all that the artist chose to give of his handiwork. No one, as is known, dared with more freedom and audacity, in compositions full of phantasy, to mingle so intimately with a just sentiment of modern realism something of the charm, poetry, and grace of antique mythology. Born at Bordeaux in 1807, of a Spanish father, exiled from his country for having conspired against Joseph Bonaparte, and deceased in England two or three years after, he also lost, while still quite young, his mother, who had become a teacher. He was brought up in a somewhat loose fashion in the woods of Sèvres, Saint-Cloud, and Meudon. At fifteen years of age, compelled to labor in order to earn a livelihood, he took to painting on porcelain. Arriving at the romantic epoch of 1830, he at first remained only a spectator, but afterward became one of the most fervent adherents. In the midst of the turmoil, he contracted with some of the most celebrated men of his time firm friendships and ardent admiration, which only terminated with his life. His paintings were exhibited from 1831 to 1836, and for the last time in 1855, since which year his works were only to be met with in the collections of rich amateurs, but he still worked most diligently. His studio was incumbered with sketches which he showed to his intimate friends with a complacency which, perhaps, was not exempt from a certain sentiment of satisfaction. It is those works—compositions and figures in oil, sketches, thoughts, landscapes, painting in distemper, water-colors, and drawings in pencil and with the pen, to the number of 300—which are to compose the first portion of the sale. In them will be found, in different degrees, all the marvelous qualities which led to the deceased artist's renown. The second part will comprise the paintings, water-colors, and drawings of contemporary masters, whom Diaz loved and admired with the utmost sincerity, being the works of Corot, Millet, Rousseau, Delacroix, and among others, "Le Roi Jean à la Bataille de Poitiers," a finished study for the painting which forms part of the collection of Victor d'Osenbray; magnificent water-color drawings by Barye, Eugene Delacroix, de Jongkind, Millet, Rousseau, and others; engravings and lithographs by Delacroix, Bonnington, &c. Several pictures by old masters which Diaz had carefully selected, occupy places by the side of the works just named, and among them may be named "A Virgin with an Infant Jesus," by Van Orley; a superb "Portrait of a Woman," which Diaz attributed to Watteau; some remarkable drawings by Rembrandt; a very pretty water-color by Sir Joshua Reynolds, and a splendid gouache by Correcio—the "Antiquary of Paris." Diaz was too much of an artist not to like to have about him works of art and curiosity; and so he leaves a very important private collection, which will be sold after the pictures and drawings. Among them may be mentioned: a medallion in white marble representing the head of a young girl, an Italian work of the early part of the sixteenth century; a triptic in Limoges enamel; some antique coins; a whole series of artistic bronzes by Barye; French and foreign earthenware; Chinese and Japanese porcelain; ancient jewels and gold and silver articles; a set of furnitures of the time of Henry II.; bronzes and furniture of the periods of Louis XIV., XV., and XVI.; several large pieces of tapestry, silks, &c.

LIVE LOBSTERS FOR ENGLAND.

The Portland (Me.) Argus of Monday says: "The steamer Sardinian, which sailed from this port Saturday, took as part of her cargo a lot of live lobsters. This experiment, if successful, will introduce an important lucrative addition to the lobster business of this city. The method of keeping the lobsters alive is as follows: On the main deck was placed a large tank, 20 feet long by 8 feet wide and 3 feet high. In this was placed 700 live lobsters, water from the ocean being constantly supplied through six faucets by a donkey engine, a waste pipe carrying it off and preventing the tank from overflowing. The only fear expressed by the projectors of the enterprise is that the change from excessive cold water to the mildness of the Gulf Stream may result disastrously upon the lobsters, but they have hopes that this will not seriously affect them."

WASHINGTON'S TRIBUTE.

The Richmond (Va.) Whig says: "We were recently shown an interesting document which contained a sketch of Col. Joshua Frye, who died at Willis' Creek May 31, 1754, and was there buried. Col. Frye was an officer commissioned by the English Government, and commanded the Virginia regiment of which George Washington was Major. The document relates that Washington and the Army attended the funeral, and that Washington cut upon an oak which stood near his tomb the following inscription: 'Under this oak tree lies the body of the good, the noble and just Frye.'"

THE WORK OF A MANIAC.

A MOTHER MURDERED BY HER SON.

AN EXCITING STRUGGLE BETWEEN AN INSANE MAN AND HIS MOTHER AND SISTER—HE KILLS THE FORMER AND SEVERELY INJURES THE LATTER—HEROIC CONDUCT OF THE DAUGHTER IN HER VAIN EFFORT TO SAVE HER MOTHER—THE CORONER'S INQUEST.

A murder of a peculiarly horrifying character was committed early yesterday morning in the village of Egbertville, Staten Island. The murderer was Patrick Dowling, and the victim was his mother, a woman who had passed the age of three score and ten. It is believed that the murderer was actuated by a sudden frenzy, and his actions just previous to the commission of the crime, and since, lead to the belief that he was and is insane. Dowling also endeavored to murder his sister, and afterward made an attempt to kill a man who protected her. The story of the tragedy is as follows: For a week or more Patrick Dowling, the murderer, has given evidence of insanity: he has always been quiet in manner, and seldom absented himself from home. Recently he became moody, spiritless, and inert; seldom spoke to his mother, with whom he lived in a small tenement, and appeared to be brooding over some weighty matter. After a few days he became violent in his manner, and cut to pieces articles of furniture in the poorly-furnished apartments. While in his violent moods he threatened several times to kill his mother, and she became so alarmed that when his sister Anne, who is employed in this City, visited her on Sunday last, she requested her to remain at home. On Sunday and Monday Patrick was so violent in his manner that the young woman determined that her brother should be put under restraint. Not knowing how to procure his removal to the lunatic asylum she consulted with the parish priest, Father Barry. The reverend gentleman, after talking with her brother, became convinced that he was insane, and reported the fact to the Justice of the Peace of the district. At the request of Squire Meehan physicians tested the mental condition of Dowling, and having reported that he was undoubtedly insane, a warrant was issued for his arrest. The warrant was issued early on Wednesday night, but the Constable neglected to call for it, and Dowling was not arrested. On Wednesday night Mrs. Dowling and her daughter retired to rest early, leaving Patrick in the lower apartment of the tenement, which contains only two rooms, poorly furnished. It has been Dowling's habit of late to sleep only for short periods, and to alternate his periods of rest with short excursions along the wayside. On Wednesday night he awoke and went out upon the road. After wandering for some time he returned in a frenzy, carrying in his hand a soda-water bottle. He ran quickly up the stairway into the apartment in which his mother and sister were sleeping, and aroused the former by pulling her rudely. When she jumped from the bed he struck her with the bottle, and for a moment stunned her. Then he caught up a heavy oil-lamp that stood upon a table near the bed and struck his mother with it several times. Finally, he threw the lamp at the weak old woman, struck her upon the head, and then bounding against the wall, was dashed to pieces. By this time the sister grappled with her crazed brother, and while they struggled he struck her repeatedly with the bottle. Seeing that her brother intended to kill the old woman, she sought to shield her mother and endeavored to push her toward the stairs. In the meanwhile she held off the maniac who was dividing his blows between her and his mother. At the head of the narrow stairway a terrible struggle took place. Dowling tried to hurl both the women down the steps, but the heroic girl resisted him successfully. She kept between him and the dazed old woman, and the three went down the flight of stairs slowly, fighting all the way. In the contest the bannister that guarded the staircase was broken, and Dowling, having dropped to the bottom, grasped one of its pieces as a weapon. With this he showered blows upon his unfortunate relatives. Still the heroic girl moved toward the door, pushing her mother before her. By a quick movement she reached the courtyard with the old woman, and, closing it behind her, held it fast with one hand while she upheld her fainting mother with the other.

The maniac inside howled in a frightful manner, while she shrieked for aid. Before assistance came he had pried open the door with his weapon, and the daughter was compelled to abandon her mother and flee for safety. The lunatic followed her for a short distance, and then turned back to where his mother lay unconscious. He struck the poor old woman several blows with his terrible weapon, and left her dead with her face horribly disfigured with wounds. Then he followed his sister to a house about 300 feet distant into which the poor young woman had burst an entrance in her headlong flight. He ran into the house through the door side had broken, and going up stairs, tried to enter the room into which she had gone for safety. He was met by Lawrence Curry, into whose apartments the sister had ran. A struggle took place, which was terminated by Curry tripping and throwing the maniac down the stairway. Another fierce fight took place at the foot of the stairs, and then Dowling was again overmastered. He was then thrown out into the court-yard, and the door of the house was closed. He procured an axe, however, and began to break in the door. Lawrence Curry again confronted him, and received a blow on the right side of the forehead. The blow did not stun him, but induced a fiercer affray. The result of this conflict was that Dowling was again overpowered, and the axe taken away from him. Dowling then ran into the road, where he was met by Nicholas Curry and his son Sylvester, who were hurrying to the assistance of their cousin. They threw the maniac down and bound him with ropes. He was taken, fettered, to the County Jail, and, after several hours' stay there, was removed to the County Poor-house, where he is now confined. After Dowling was safely bound his mother's body was found lying near the door-step of his home. His sister's and Lawrence Curry's wounds are painful, but not dangerous.

THE INQUEST.

An inquest was held yesterday afternoon into the cause of the death of Mrs. Dowling, by Coronor Dempsey. The first witness was Annie Dowling, who testified as follows: I first noticed my brother Patrick getting sick on Sunday last; I came home Sunday night; he appeared melancholy; his eyes were wild-looking; I spoke to him, and asked him how he did; I spoke to my mother, and she said she was going to have him put up, as her life was in danger; he had threatened her twice; mother said she would have to see about it right away, and on Monday Owen Hogan and I went to Father Barry to have his opinion first; Father Barry came there on Tuesday, and said to my brother, "You are not right; you are not yourself sometimes;" my brother said, "Why, Sir; sometimes I am not;" Father Barry told him he ought to be a man, and ought to leave off those habits; he was then cutting up the chairs, but Father Barry pretended not to notice him; Father Barry then said he would inform Squire Meehan about it; I have remained home ever since Sunday night; he has acted very wild and ferocious; he destroyed articles of furniture, but did not attempt to injure any member of the family; the doctors came yesterday morning; Dr. Millspaugh asked some questions of Pat which I do not now recollect; in the afternoon the doctors called again; they had a talk with mother, and Dr. Millspaugh said he thought a dose of medicine would make Pat all right; then mother said, "Doctor, I think our lives are in danger;" Dr. Millspaugh then went down stairs, and Patrick met him and said, "Doctor, I am trying to go to hell;" I think the Doctor said that hell was a pretty bad place; Dr. Millspaugh came up stairs then and said it was a pretty bad case; I said, "Doctor, it is pretty hard to make you believe anything;" he said, "Yes, I see that he is pretty bad;" then he said to me "It takes some time to see these cases;" I said, "You see he is crazy;" he said, "I see it now;" Dr. Millspaugh then went away, and Dr. Clarke afterward talked to Pat; I asked Dr. Millspaugh for Patrick's removal yesterday; after the doctors left us Patrick acted very crazy, as crazy as could be; I was afraid to sleep in the house last night, was trembling, and was afraid the doctors would not send to take Patrick away; I went to bed last night; Patrick woke me up at 3 o'clock; he had been out, and had the door open; he walked right up stairs and walked in; he said, "I will get you out of here;" I could not see whether he had anything in his hand, as there was no light; I think he had something in his hand when he struck me; he took hold of my hair and struck me on the head with a small bottle that I had baking-soda in; he used a heavy oil lamp on my mother; there was no light in the room, but it was moonlight; the lamp was very heavy; he had hold of my clothes as I was coming down stairs, and he had hold of my mother pushing her as she was in front of us; he pulled down the bannister as we were going down stairs; he lost the bottle on the stairs, and then kept hitting me with a piece of the bannister; I got my mother and myself outside of the door before him; he then put a stick between the door and the jamb, and pried the door open; I then let my mother go; she fell, and he followed me part of the way to Larry Curry's; he saw that I got away, and turned back again, and murdered my mother; he afterward came to Curry's yard, where he got an axe, with which he broke open the door of Mr. Curry's house, and ran in after me; Larry Curry saved me; mother was struck over the head with a glass bottle; he gave her a few blows with a glass lamp before I got out of doors; every blow was on the top of her head.

Lawrence Curry testified that he had known Patrick Dowling for 14 or 15 years, and had never noticed symptoms of insanity in his manner until he broke into witness' house on Thursday morning. The witness was awakened by the screams of persons on the road; he had jumped out of bed when Annie Dowling dashed into his house; he then went out of his room and met Dowling, who had rushed up stairs and was trying to get into the room into which his sister had gone for protection. Dowling said nothing, but howled loudly; he carried in his hand a piece of a balaster, with which he struck the door of the room. Curry here described his struggles with the lunatic as they are detailed above.

John Meehan, Justice of the Peace of the town of Southfield, testified that he had been informed by Father Barry that Dowling was insane, and had requested Drs. Millspaugh and Clarke to examine into his mental condition. He then said that Dr. Millspaugh reported to him that Dowling was insane, and that he had issued a warrant for the arrest of the lunatic and his committal to the County Poor-house. The warrant was issued on Wednesday evening, and he was awakened and asked for it at 4 o'clock on Thursday morning, after the murder.

Dr. L. Millspaugh testified that he inquired into the condition of Dowling on Wednesday morning and afternoon; he determined after minute inquiry that Dowling was insane; on the afternoon of Wednesday the maniac told him, among other absurd things, that he was "trying to go to hell, but could not get there." These remarks, with the assertions of Mrs. Dowling and her daughter that they were afraid of Patrick, caused him and Dr. Clarke to determine that Dowling was insane. The witness here described the wounds that were inflicted upon the deceased woman, Mrs. Dowling. They were seven in number, on the head and face of the deceased, besides several bruises or abrasions. The worst wound was five inches long, on the left side of the face. It was apparently done with an instrument having a sharp edge; it was of a circular form, and laid the cheek open so that it fell back upon the ear; beneath it the cheek-bone was fractured. The second wound was about five inches above the left ear, breaking the skull. The next was over the left eye, two inches long, laying bare the bone; the upper lip was split from the nose down; another wound, two inches long, was on the right temple; the lower lip was cut about half an inch down; the whole upper jaw was broken across; and the left cheek bone was broken into several pieces.

Dr. Clarke corroborated the testimony of his colleague, and gave some further particulars of no general interest.

The jury returned a verdict that "Anne Dowling came to her death, at the age of about 70 years, by wounds upon her head, inflicted by her son, Patrick Dowling, while laboring under an attack of acute mania, or mental derangement."

After the inquest a TIMES reporter visited the County Poor-house, in which Dowling is confined. He was informed that the prisoner had spoken but little during the day, and had spent part of it uttering howls like those of a dog. When he spoke it was only in response to persistent questioning. He was lying on a pallet when the reporter spoke to him, and arose from it with apparent reluctance. He said that he knew he was confined for murdering his mother. He did not know what had caused him to commit the crime, but supposed he must have been out of his mind. He knew, he said, that he had for years been the victim of bad habits against which Father Barry had cautioned him. He was nervous in manner, and looked furtively at his questioner after the fashion of an animal that has been cowed, but still looks for an opportunity to spring upon its conqueror. It took the united efforts of six men to put the prisoner into his cell, and for a time he tore wildly at the bars in a vain attempt to release himself.

A JERSEY CITY CHURCH TROUBLE.

Trouble has overtaken the First Universalist Church in Jersey City, a church which seemed to be progressing and has more than doubled its membership since the advent of Mrs. Phœbe Hanaford to the pastorate. Mrs. Hanaford became Pastor of the church in April, 1874, when she was engaged for three years. She has been unremitting in her efforts to increase the membership, and her labors have been crowned with success. Recently some of the female members have, it is said, become jealous of her, and a strong feeling of opposition has been developed, which culminated Wednesday night in an effort to depose her. The members held a meeting at which proceedings were very stormy. Deacon D. W. Holden presided. A resolution was presented instructing the Trustees to secure a male Pastor to take charge of the church from the 1st of April next. The utmost excitement followed the reading of the resolution. A Mr. Wilson protested against the resolution, and was compelled to take his seat. Amid loud cries of "Motion" and "Order" interrupted him, and he was compelled to take his seat. A motion to read the resolution again prevailed, and as soon as that was done the scene that

PROPOSALS FOR ADHESIVE POSTAGE STAMPS.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT, } Jan. 25, 1877.

Sealed proposals are invited from steel-plate engravers and plate printers, and will be received at this department until 12 o'clock M. on Wednesday, the 28th day of February, 1877, for furnishing all the postage stamps which this department may require for public and official use for a period of four years, commencing on the 1st day of May, 1877, viz:

1. Stamps for the use of the public.
2. Official stamps for the use of the executive departments.
3. Newspaper and periodical stamps.

QUALITY OF STAMPS.

The stamps must be furnished, subject to the approval of the department, from steel plates, engraved in the highest style of the art or steel engraving, and printed in such colors as may from time to time be selected by the department, in the best and most approved manner, upon paper of the best quality, suitable for the purpose and satisfactory to the department, thoroughly gummed with the best quality of adhesive gum, perforated in such manner that each separate stamp can be readily detached and used, the sheets to be well pressed, and packed so as to prevent them from adhering to each other; the same to be furnished with all reasonable dispatch in such quantities as may in each case be ordered by the department daily to fill requisitions from Postmasters and from the executive departments. The stamps must be printed on hand-roller presses.

DIES, ROLLS, AND PLATES.

The dies, rolls, and plates from which postage stamps are now printed, being the property of the United States, will be placed in the keeping and custody of the contractor on or before the first day of May, 1877, the same to be held subject to the order and control of the department, as hereinafter provided; and the contractor will be required, from said dies, rolls, and plates, and from such rolls and plates as may be necessary to be reproduced from the original dies, to have on hand, ready for issue on the day the contract term commences, a sufficient stock of stamps, of the several denominations and kinds required, to fill the current daily requisitions from the department, without hindrance or delay.

The contractor will be further required to keep in repair all dies, rolls, and plates from which stamps may be printed, and to renew the same whenever required; and should new designs be required at any time to take the place of the present series of stamps for the use of the public, or of any of them, or for denominations of stamps not now in use, the same shall be furnished and engraved, subject to the approval of the Postmaster General, upon his request, within a reasonable time; all which shall be done and executed in the best style of steel engraving by the contractor, and at his own expense. No change will be made in the present design of the postal postage stamps, or of newspaper and periodical stamps; but the contractor will be required to keep in repair, and renew when required, the dies, rolls, and plates for these stamps, the same as for the stamps for the use of the public. All dies, rolls, and plates made or used at any time in filling the contract shall immediately become the absolute property of the United States, and shall be delivered, in good working order, to the Postmaster General or his authorized agent whenever demanded.

BUILDING, PLACE OF MANUFACTURE, &c.

The stamps will be required to be manufactured in a fire-proof building, and in separate apartments, distinct from those in which any other work is done by the contractor—the whole to be subject to the approval of the department—and when finished must be placed in a fire and burglar-proof safe or vault, to be specially provided for that purpose, and constructed to the satisfaction of the department. The contractor, his employes, and agents shall conform to such regulations as the department may from time to time adopt for the security of the Government.

AGENT—OFFICE-ROOMS—INSPECTION.

A residentagent of the department will have supervision of the manufacture, storage, and issue of the stamps, who shall at all times have full and free access to the apartments, safes, and vaults where the stamps are manufactured and stored, for the purpose of inspecting the same; and the contractor shall furnish him and his clerks suitable office and desk room, for the transaction of the business of his agency, without cost to the Government. The Postmaster General shall also have the right at any time to cause an inspection to be made, by any agent or agents whom he may specially designate for the purpose, of the apartments, safes, and vaults used for the manufacture and storage of stamps, and of the stamps in course of manufacture or in stock.

STOCK ON HAND.

The contractor shall at all times keep on hand a stock of the several denominations and kinds of stamps, subject to the control of the Post Office Department, its regularly authorized agent, or such other agents as may be specially authorized by the Postmaster General, in all stages of manufacture, sufficient to meet all orders of the department, and to provide against any and all contingencies that may be likely to occur during the existence of the contract, so that each and every order of the department may be promptly filled. The department shall have the right to require the contractor at any time during the existence of the contract to furnish an extra quantity of stamps not exceeding a supply for three months.

PACKING.

Stamps to be transmitted by sea routes must be securely packed in hermetically sealed tin cases, wrapped in strong manila paper; all others must either be packed in strong binders'-board boxes, bound on the edges and corners with muslin, and enveloped in two thicknesses of strong manila paper, or inclosed in strong manila envelopes, as the quantity to be transmitted may require; all packages to be so inclosed as to enable the agent of the department to officially seal them.

DELIVERY.

The stamps may be required to be delivered by the contractor, in separate packages, as above provided for, at the Post Office in the place where the same are manufactured, or at such other Post Office in the immediate vicinity of the place of manufacture as the Postmaster General may direct; or in such quantities at the Post Office Department, Washington, D. C. (each denomination and kind being kept separate,) as the Postmaster General may direct.

BLANKS.

In addition, the contractor will be required to furnish labels, and direct the same, for each package, in accordance with the daily lists furnished by the agent of the department, together with all other blanks required to be inclosed with the stamps; also, all blanks for daily, weekly, monthly, and quarterly returns relating to the number and denominations of stamps furnished.

REPORTS.

The contractor will be required to report weekly, under oath, the number, denomination, and kind of stamps manufactured, (finished, unfinished, and spoiled,) the number used during the week, and the number available for issue; all spoiled stamps to be destroyed by the agent of the department in the presence of the contractor or his representative, or otherwise disposed of, as the Postmaster General may direct.

AWARD.

The contract will be awarded on the basis of the number of the several kinds of stamps issued during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1876, as follows:

1. Number of stamps for use of the public.....698,799,090
2. Number of official stamps for use of the executive departments.....17,082,665
3. Number of newspaper and periodical stamps.....1,290,347
Total.....717,772,102

Bids must be made for each kind of stamps separately, the bidders stating in their proposals the price per 1,000 of each stamp, delivered, as they may elect to be done or furnished, as set forth in this advertisement; and the contract will be awarded as a whole to the lowest responsible bidder in the aggregate, the amount of a bid to be ascertained by adding the above issues at the prices bid respectively, and then aggregating the amounts of the three several items. It must be understood, however, that proposals made under this advertisement shall include all the stamps needed by the department during the contract term, without reference to the above issues. Should the use of any of the above kinds of stamps be discontinued during the contract term, the contractor will not be entitled to damages on account of such discontinuance.

PROPOSALS—AGREEMENT—BOND.

Each proposal must be signed by the individual or partnership making it, and when made by a partnership the name of each partner thereof must be disclosed; and it must be accompanied by a guaranty, signed by at least two responsible guarantors, that the bidder shall, within ten days after being called upon to do so, execute a contract to furnish promptly, and in quantities as ordered, the articles or articles to be furnished by him, the responsibility and sufficiency of the signers to such guaranty to be certified to by the Postmaster or United States Attorney where the bidder resides; and in such contract the contractor and his sureties

LOCAL MISCELLANY.

THE INSURANCE TROUBLES.

MR. JOHN J. ANDERSON, RECEIVER OF THE CONTINENTAL LIFE COMPANY, RESIGNS HIS OFFICE.

At the first hearing before Mr. William Allen Butler, the Referee in the matter of Stephen English and others against the Continental Life Insurance Company, counsel for the petitioner moved that the Referee make a special report to the court requiring Mr. John J. Anderson, the Receiver of the company, to furnish additional bondsmen in place of Luther W. Frost, the former President of the concern, and R. C. Frost, one of its Directors, with a view of securing the safety of the funds. On the following Monday Mr. Butler filed a report to that effect before Judge Gilbert, in the Supreme Court, in Brooklyn, and an order was entered directing the Receiver to file a new bond for $200,000, with two sureties. This he failed to do, and yesterday the matter was brought to the attention of Judge Pratt, who, on motion of Mr. Moses, counsel for the petitioner, granted an order to the Receiver to file the required bonds within 24 hours or show cause why he should not be removed from the position of Receiver. Some such move as this had no doubt been anticipated, and later in the day Mr. John L. Hill, of counsel for the Receiver, appeared in court and presented to Justice Pratt a petition which set forth that the petitioner, John J. Anderson, had been appointed to the position of Receiver of the Continental Life Insurance Company, on Oct. 25 last, in an action brought by John O. Hoyt for the dissolution of the corporation; that he had at once entered upon the duties of his office in accordance with the order of the court, and that he has performed all the duties required of him; that he then came into possession of all the property of the company and a number of valuable securities that had been illegally transfered. The petitioner further sets forth that he had with fidelity discharged the duties of his office, and that he had been subjected to much unfavorable criticism and assailed as being in collusion with the former officers of the corporation. Besides this, the Superintendent of the Insurance Department of the State had begun, through the Attorney General, in the Third Department of the Supreme Court, proceedings for the removal of the petitioner as Receiver on the ground that he was appointed by collusion and fraud. The petitioner intended to continue and complete his duties, but the demand on his time, patience, and endurance is so great that he desires to be relieved. He therefore prays that the court will accept his resignation and appoint a suitable person to act in his stead; that reasonable compensation be allowed to him, and that a reference be ordered to pass his accounts.

Justice Pratt, after hearing counsel, granted an order to the parties in interest, of whom there are about 30, to show cause why the prayer of the petition should not be granted and another Receiver appointed. The order is returnable on Saturday morning, and will be served on the Insurance Department so that it may have some voice in the selection of the Receiver to succeed Mr. Anderson.

THE SECURITY LIFE COMPANY.

Up to a late hour last night none of the officers of the Security Life Insurance and Annuity Company, against whom the Grand Jury have found indictments, were arrested. Nor had they, so far as could be learned yesterday, received notice from the District Attorney to procure bail. The indictment of Robert L. Case, President, and Robert L. Case, Jr., Actuary, for perjury, has caused a considerable feeling of anxiety among their friends in Newburg. Mr. Case, the President, has long been a resident of that city, occupying a handsome residence on Grand street, one of the most fashionable thoroughfares in the City. He was considered to be a gentleman of spotless integrity, and his family have moved in the wealthiest and most fashionable society. Since the Security collapsed, Mr. Case has disposed of his horses (except one) and wagons, discharged both his household servants and stablemen, and returned to the simplicity in living to which he was formerly compelled to adhere on account, as is stated, of a failure in business. It is said that Mr. Case had the greatest faith up to the last moment in the solvency of the Security, or at least its ability to tide over any financial embarrassment, it might have had hanging over its head. Mr. Case is a prominent member of the Board of Education of Newburg, and has always taken the greatest interest in the public schools.

THE NEW-JERSEY MUTUAL.

All efforts to find Mr. J. H. Stedwell, the President of the New-Jersey Mutual Life Insurance Company, have thus far failed. Regarding the recent transfer of the assets of that concern to the National Capitol of Washington, nothing further has been learned, and the officials of both companies are now awaiting the decision of the Court of Chancery, before which the question of the receivership will be argued on Tuesday next.

LABOR TROUBLES IN BROOKLYN.

THE STRIKE OF THE 'LONGSHOREMEN—A NOISY PARADE AND DEMONSTRATION ALONG THE EAST RIVER FRONT—SERIOUS AFFRAYS—THE POLICE GUARDING THE STORES.

The strike of the Brooklyn 'longshoremen, which commenced last Monday, still continues. Yesterday the strikers were joined by 150 men who turned out from Harbeck's stores, on Furman street, near Fulton. A large force of Police is stationed at different points along the water front, to prevent the strikers offering violence to the men who have been brought from New-York to fill their places. The extent of territory to be covered is, however, so great, that some points have necessarily been left uncovered. On Thursday the strikers broke into the Central stores, and assaulted in a most brutal manner a number of German and Italian workmen. Yesterday a disposition to use violence was shown at several of the warehouses, but the Police arrangements made by Inspector Waddy were so complete that the more riotous of the strikers were kept in check. A number of men working at the Franklin stores, near the Atlantic Basin, were attacked by the strikers about 3 o'clock yesterday afternoon. One of the strikers got into the stores by a rear door, and then opened the gate for his fellows. Most of the workmen escaped, but the following were wounded: Louis Loyn, Frederick Haberlin, George Lachman, and Jacob Schuber. The latter received a severe scalp wound and was taken to the Long Island College Hospital. The others, who were but slightly wounded, were able to return to their homes in New-York. In the opinion of the Police authorities the chief danger arising from the present movement among the grain shovelers, is from the fact that there are thousands of men out of employment in this City and Brooklyn who naturally visit the scene of the strike, and being themselves on the verge of starvation, are rendered desperate and easily moved to violence by those who are riotously inclined.

The Police arrangements are as good as the number of the force will admit of. At Bartlett and Green's stores there were stationed a Sergeant and 15 patrolmen; at Harbeck's stores, 2 Sergeants and 15 patrolmen; at the foot of Jorulemon street a Sergeant and 15 men; at Hazeltine Brothers' stores, foot of Pacific street, 2 Sergeants and 30 men, and at their stores at the foot of Irving street, 2 Sergeants and 20 men; and at the Atlantic Basin 2 Sergeants and 15 men, making a total of 120 officers and men, all armed with revolvers and heavy clubs. In addition, all the remaining "reserves" of the city were under warning orders in the station-houses, and could be summoned by telegraph from headquarters by Superintendent Campbell at a moment's intimation from either the Second, Third, or Eleventh Precinct Station-houses, the nearest stations to the docks. Inspector Waddy was in command of the men, with Drill Capts. Jewett acting as his Lieutenant, and Capts. Crafts, Smith, Leavy, and Reilly assisting.

About 9 o'clock yesterday morning the strikers assemoled at Red Hook Point and marched along the river front to the Empire stores. At their head was a band of music, and as they marched the ranks were rapidly swelled by new additions. Many of those in the crowd had come from New-York. The cheering of the men as they paraded the streets was so lusty as to drown the efforts of the six musicians who formed the band. Dividing the column into two bodies, the leader, a tall man dressed in gray clothes, who carried a large stick, directed the men to march on to the dock in front of the Empire stores. The divisions met in front of the stores, and at once commenced to search for any workmen who might have accepted the 20 cents an hour offered by the employers. Just at this juncture a squad of Police who had followed the strikers from Harbeck's stores in Furman street, entered the gate on Dock street on the double-quick, and with their clubs in their hands drove back the crowd. The squad numbered 18 men and was commanded by Capt. Crafts, with Sergts. Meeks, Strong and Carrigan. Some of the men were unwilling to leave the dock, but the shake of the officers' staffs showed them that they meant business. After about 10 minutes the dock was entirely cleared. The men were completely demoralized. Some of them took the Catherine ferry-boat to New-York. The band fled, and there was no attempt made to rally the forces. After some time they returned by different routes to their old stands along Furman and Columbia streets. Intimidation is being used by the strikers, and it is feared that the strike will become general among the 'longshoremen on the river front.

BURIED ALIVE.

While cleaning a well 45 feet deep on Jeremiah Valentine's farm, Jamaica road, Flushing, L. I., on Island, yesterday afternoon, John Sladder was buried alive. The sides of the well caved in, and it was impossible to rescue him.

THE CHAMBER OF COMMERCE.

The Chamber of Commerce met yesterday, Mr. S. D. Babcock in the chair. Mr. Henry B. Anchincloss, Mr. William H. Lyon, Mr. William Sulzbacher, Mr. Frederick Taylor, and Mr. William Tilden were elected members. A communication was received from Signal Officer H. H. C. Dunwoody, by Mr. Paul N. Spofford, calling attention to the report by the Signal Inspectors that the members of the meteorological committees in some cities are not thoroughly acquainted with the duties pertaining to the office. The Chief Signal Officer of the Army has requested that members of the meteorological committees should be appointed directly by the Chief Signal Officer, and that instructions for the guidance of the committees should be issued by him. The Signal Officer asked that the following resolution should be adopted:

Resolved, That the Meteorological Committee of the chamber shall be a permanent committee, and that the names of the members and any change in membership be in each case formally notified to the Chief Signal Officer of the Army. The committee will confer with the Chief Signal Officer, and will bring before the chamber all matters requiring its action or relating to aid needed for, or improvement of, the signal service.

The matter was referred to the Committee on Harbor and Shipping.

On motion of Mr. Gustav Schwab, Mr. S. D. Babcock was added to the Committee on Bank Taxation, which will have a hearing before the Banking Committee of the House of Representatives on Wednesday next.

A communication from the Cheap Transportation Association relative to the Belgian Cable Towing system was received and referred to a committee of five members, who were appointed by the President as follows: Mr. S. B. Ruggles, Mr. J. F. Henry, Mr. W. H. Fogg, Mr. J. S. T. Stranahan, and Mr. Paul N. Spofford.

A number of memorials from the Chicago Board of Trade, addressed to Congress, were received and referred to the Executive Committee. They ask for the establishment of a Government Department of Commerce, to be charged with the supervision and control of the commercial, agricultural, manufacturing, and mining interests of the United States; that its bankrupt laws shall be amended and simplified; that correspondence shall be opened with the Government of Great Britain with a view to securing immunity for the shipping of the United States from payment of light dues in the ports of the United Kingdom; that an early and entire revision of the international revenue system of the country shall be made, and that all existing laws be modified so as to produce the largest revenue on the smallest list of articles; that a law shall be enacted regulating the issue, negotiability, and use of bills of lading, railroad receipts, and other evidences of the receipts and possession of property of common carriers for transportation abroad or between States; and asking that the President appoint three Commissioners to confer with Commissioners authorized by the Government of Great Britain to investigate and ascertain on what basis a treaty of reciprocal trade for the mutual benefit of the United States and the Dominion of Canada can be negotiated.

Mr. Henry M. Tabor directed attention to the fact that a bill for the modification of the Usury law was before the Legislature, and asked that a memorial should be prepared and presented to that body. A resolution to that effect was referred to the Executive Committee.

INTER-COLLEGIATE ASSOCIATION.

A PERMANENT ORGANIZATION TO BE EFFECTED—PLAN FOR A NEW CONSTITUTION ADOPTED—SPECIALISTS NOT TO BE COMPETITORS FOR HONORS.

A meeting of the Inter-Collegiate Literary Association was held yesterday afternoon at the Fifth Avenue Hotel for the purpose of reorganizing the society upon a permanent basis. There were present Eugene Frere, of Cornell, who occupied the chair, and delegates from Syracuse, Hamilton, New-York University, Wesleyan, North Western University, Princeton, Rutgers, St. John's, of Fordham, College of the City of New-York, and Williams. After a long discussion, the report of the Committee of College Presidents, recommending the plan of a new constitution was adopted. It is as follows:

1. The Inter-Collegiate Literary Association shall consist of such students as are pursuing a general course for their first degree, or those who have taken their degree in such course within a year, in the associated colleges, and of the members of their Faculties of instruction, with such other persons as may become united with them under this Constitution.

2. The management of the association shall be vested in a Council of Regents. These shall be chosen by three electoral bodies, Faculties, students, and fellows. There shall be one representative from each of the faculties of the academic departments of the associated colleges. There shall be a like number chosen by the senior and junior classes of the associated colleges. There shall be a like number chosen by the fellows of the association, which body of fellows shall consist of all who have examined candidates for honors, of those who have taken prizes, being graduates, and of honorary members, not exceeding a dozen at any one time, chosen by the fellows because of their eminence in literature, science, or philosophy, or because they have rendered important services to the association.

3. These representatives, constituting the Board of Regents aforesaid, shall be chosen annually by ballot. They shall be called to meet in council by the President of the Association.

4. A President, Vice President, Secretary, and Treasurer of the Association, shall be chosen by joint ballot by the Council of Regents, and shall continue in office two years, until their successors shall be appointed.

5. The Council of Regents at its annual meeting shall appoint an Acting Committee, which shall meet in New-York City, and execute the resolutions of the Council of Regents.

6. In all questions before the Board of Regents no member of that board shall vote by proxy.

7. The competitors for examination shall present a statement of the studies pursued by them in their college or university course to the examiners in the respective departments for examination at least one month before the examinations occur. These statements shall be certified to by the President of the college to which the students belong. The examiners shall upon this statement decide upon the eligibility of the students for competition.

After the adoption of the report, a committee of five was appointed to prepare a new constitution, based upon the plan suggested by the Committee of College Presidents. It was also resolved that the committee of five should complete their labors by Feb. 15, and that the different colleges—the vote of two-thirds of which cast in favor of the new constitution should make it binding upon the association—should express their approval or disapproval of the constitution by March 5. After the adoption of a resolution giving the said Executive Committee of the association power to continue its labors until the organization of the Council of Regents, the association adjourned.

LOW CANAL TOLLS.

ACTION OF THE BOARD OF MANAGERS OF THE PRODUCE EXCHANGE—RESOLUTIONS IN FAVOR OF CHEAP CANAL TRANSPORTATION.

A meeting of the Board of Managers of the Produce Exchange was held yesterday, Mr. L. J. N. Stark, the President, in the chair. A vacancy in the board, caused by the resignation of Mr. Horatio Reed, was filled by the election of Mr. Monroe Crane. Messrs. John G. Dale, Frederick Meissner, and P. C. Bogert were appointed the Complaint Committee for February. The following resolutions were presented and unanimously adopted:

Whereas, The New-York Produce Exchange view with serious concern the change that has of late been taking place in the relations of New-York City to the grain trade of the West, through the extraordinary efforts making by and in behalf of other ports to the natural advantages are in no respect equal to her own; and

Whereas, The City of New-York has in her State canals an auxiliary which, if properly availed of, is capable of maintaining her position as the great export and import City of the country; and

Whereas, It should ever be kept in mind that the Erie Canal was not designed for revenue merely, but rather to secure for our State those indirect but larger rewards which come from the control of commerce;

Resolved, That the Canal Board be requested to take such steps as shall in their judgment be deemed best calculated to enable the Erie Canal to carry out the purpose for which it was built—to bring the products of the West through to the seaboard at the lowest possible cost of transportation; and to this end we heartily approve of the views expressed by his Excellency Gov. Robinson in his annual Message to the Legislature, wherein he says that "the question of high or low tolls in the present condition and prospects of canal transportation is one about which there would seem to be no difference of opinion."

Resolved, That a copy of the foregoing be sent to the several members of the Canal Board and of the Legislature, to his Excellency Gov. Robinson, and to the Buffalo Board of Trade.

A mass meeting of all who are interested in the matter of low canal tolls will be held in the Cooper Institute on Wednesday evening, Feb. 7, at 7:30 o'clock. Mr. Peter Cooper will preside.

MUNICIPAL AFFAIRS.

THE COMMON COUNCIL.

TAMMANY ALDERMEN MAKING WAR ON THE COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC WORKS—PROPOSED UNDERGROUND RAILROAD FROM THE CITY HALL TO THE GRAND CENTRAL RAILROAD DEPOT—A PROJECT TO FILL UP MARSHY LANDS ON THE EAST RIVER WITH ASHES AND STREET SWEEPINGS.

For some time past the relations between the Democratic members of the Board of Aldermen and Mr. Allan Campbell, the Commissioner of Public Works, have not been of a very pleasant character. It is said that the disagreement was caused by the action of Mr. Campbell in appointing a number of inspectors to report any waste of Croton water they might discover while visiting dwelling-houses, factories, &c., without dividing this and other patronage among some of the City Fathers who had voted for his confirmation. Yesterday, however, when the Board of Aldermen met, two of its members made open war on the Commissioner. One of them, Mr. Tuomey, offered a resolution reciting that Mr. Campbell received a salary of $10,000 a year; that the office he held was an important one, requiring his undivided attention; that he also holds the position of President of the Consolidation Coal Company, a position which frequently obliged him to visit Baltimore and other places at a great distance from this City; that in some instances it was necessary to forward papers requiring his signature to those places. The resolutions then request the Mayor to inquire whether Mr. Campbell is holding the two positions named, and in case he is, that he request him to resign either of the positions, and in the event of his neglect or refusal to do so, that the Mayor take the necessary measures to remove him.

Alderman Tuomey made a few remarks on the spirit of the resolutions, and was followed by Alderman Bryan Reilly, who supported them.

Alderman Purroy moved that the whole matter be referred to the Committee on Public Works. This motion was the signal for an exciting and acrimonious debate.

Alderman Bryan Reilly hoped that the resolutions would not be referred. They should be acted upon at once. The proudest day of his life was when he voted against making Mr. Campbell Commissioner of Public Works. Before he was confirmed, a son of the Commissioner said he wished to know "if that Irish rabble was to dictate who should be head of the Department of Public Works." He was assured that Mr. Campbell's son had made that remark. "I also know," continued the Alderman, "that members of this board have been discourteously treated in Mr. Campbell's office."

Alderman Morris—I supported Commissioner Campbell, although he is a Democrat, because I believed he would make an excellent head of his department.

Alderman Bryan Reilly replied that Commissioner Campbell was not a Democrat up to the year 1872, and that his son, Thomas Cooper Campbell, never voted the Democratic ticket until he was sent to the Legislature. In regard to the latter's remark about the Irish rabble, he would say that he (the speaker) was an Irishman, and that the remark was improper.

Alderman Morris referring to the statement in the resolution that Mr. Campbell held two positions, said he believed that all Commissioners of departments had private business to attend to.

Alderman Cowing remarked that the gentleman [Mr. Reilly] had let the cat out of the bag by complaining that he or somebody else had been called an Irishman. He did not believe that gentlemen should come before the board to redress their personal grievances. If they presented proper charges he (Mr. Cowing) would be fairly investigated.

Mr. Purroy's motion to refer the resolutions to the Committee on Public Works was adopted by a vote of 16 to 6.

Alderman Cowing introduced a resolution requesting the Corporation Counsel to examine the ordinances in relation to hoistways, and in case they were defective to prepare others so as to prevent accidents. It was adopted.

Alderman Sneils moved that the Mayor report to the board the number of City railroad cars for which no license fees are paid in this City. Adopted.

Alderman Purroy submitted several preambles and resolutions reciting that the main hope of a speedy solution of the rapid-transit question lies in the extension of steam transit from the Grand Central Depot to the City Hall, and requesting the Mayor to ascertain the feasibility of constructing by private enterprise an underground road, commencing at or near the City Hall, and connecting with the rapid-transit trains now running on the Harlem Road, the cost of such road, the time required for its completion, the measures necessary to obtain in conformity with law the requisite franchises, and all other matters relating to the construction and operation of such road, and that he report thereon to the board. The resolutions were adopted.

The committee appointed to investigate the charges preferred against Commissioner Porter and the architects of the Third District Court-house, presented a majority and minority report. The former, which was signed by Messrs. Purroy and Keenan, stated that the practice which prevailed in the case, of charging $10 for a bill of quantities and paying a percentage on the amount of the contracts when awarded, was a pernicious one; that to some of the bills of quantities which were prepared by employes of the architects were added the words: "and three-quarters of 1 per cent. for quantities." This amount, continues the report, would be a loss to the City. There was no evidence that the architects, Messrs. Withers & Vaux, had any pecuniary interest in these commissions, but they and Commissioner Porter were cognizant of the matter, and could have stopped it. Reference is next made to the practice of former State Legislatures in appointing commissions for the performance of work in this City, which (the report says) could be done as well and more economically by the appropriate departments of the City Government. This practice, it says, has resulted in increasing the City debt by a large amount. The cost of the Third District Court-house so far was $494,211 50. To the report was appended an ordinance providing that the Commissioner of Public Works shall superintend the work of completing the Third District Court-house. The minority report, which was signed by Mr. Howland, stated that the charges were made by persons who presented bills for extra work which the architects refused to certify, and exonerated Commissioner Porter and the architects from the charges. The report also recited that the building was put up in a substantial manner; that its cost was within the appropriation made for it, and that it was an ornament to the City. The report then recommended that the present commission be author zed to superintend the completion of the building. Both reports were laid over.

The question of heating the cars was then called up. Two reports were submitted by the Committee on Railroads, to whom the matter was referred. The first, which was signed by Messrs. Gunther and Reilly, recommended that the city railroad companies be required to conform to all the regulations imposed for the comfort and convenience of passengers by the Board of Health; that the said board be required to compel such companies to keep, while en route, the front doors of their cars constantly closed in cold weather, and that clean straw be provided for the floor of each car in such quantities as the board may direct. The minority report, which was signed by Mr. Cowing, was in favor of having 10 per cent. of the cars heated as an experiment.

The majority report was adopted by a vote of 16 to 6.

THE DISPOSITION OF ASHES AND STREET-SWEEPINGS.

Alderman Morris offered the following, which was ordered to be printed:

Whereas, It is not only desirable, but indispensably necessary, from an economical and sanitary point of view, that some provision should be made for depositing the ashes and sweepings of the streets of this City other than the present expensive, annoying, and, in winter, impracticable method of transporting them out to sea, and depositing such refuse in the tideway outside the harbor limits; a system which costs more than $100,000 a year; causes dissatisfaction to residents of adjoining territory, and involves an incalculable waste of material that can be used to great advantage in extending the area of land owned by the City, by reclaiming from the surrounding waters many acres, which would ultimately be of great value; and

Whereas, Such a desired object of gain can be secured by taking measures to fill up the estuary that separates Ward's from Randall's Island, known as "Little Hell Gate," and by filling the marshy land adjoining these islands, including the strait on the east side of Randall's Island which separates it from the "sunken meadow," or "Drowned Marsh," thereby uniting these two islands and the "Drowned Marsh," and reclaiming the low lands adjoining on the east side, which will add more than 100 acres of land to the real property of the City, and supply a place for depositing the ashes required to be removed for 50 years to come. The estuary known as the "Kills," which separates Randall's Island from the recently annexed Twenty-third Ward, might also, with advantage, be filled in, and the channel between Ward and Randall's islands with the mainland, converting them into a promontory, greatly enlarging the water front, and affording an opportunity for the erection of railroad depots, warehouses and other commercial appliances. The closing of these two estuaries would also greatly improve the navigation of the Harlem River, as the vast volume of water that now passes through them would be turned into the Harlem River, thus creating a tideway that would clean and widen the channel; and

Whereas, The present seems an opportune time for inaugurating this important enterprise: Gen. Newton being engaged in the work of improving the navigation of the East River, at Hell Gate, would, doubtless, gladly avail himself of the opportunity thus afforded to deposit the material excavated in his mining operations, and the stones and debris thus removed from the East River could be utilized in the construction of a dam at each or either end of the two estuaries, behind which, for many years to come, the City would find a convenient and profitable receptacle for the ashes and other refuse material required to be removed from the streets; be it, therefore,

Resolved, That the Presidents of the Harbor Commissioners, on the part of the State, the Presidents of the Departments of Police and Docks, and the Counsel to the Corporation, on the part of the City, and Gen. Johnston, on behalf of the United States Government, be and they are hereby, severally and respectively requested to meet at the office of the President of the Police Department, No. 300 Mulberry street, on the call of the last-named officer, to consider the advisability and practicability of the measure proposed in the preamble to this resolution, or any part thereof, and report the result of their deliberations to this Common Council, through his Honor the Mayor, together with drafts of the laws necessary to be passed, if any, to authorize the immediate commencement of the proposed improvement. It being understood that before taking final action the project shall receive the approbation of his Honor the Mayor, to be expressed in a communication transmitting the results of the deliberations of the officers above named to the Common Council.

ANOTHER REPORT TO THE CONFERENCE OF COMMERCIAL BODIES—WHAT ARE CONSIDERED THE NECESSARY FACILITIES FOR COMMERCE.

An adjourned conference of the representatives of the Chamber of Commerce, the Cheap Transportation Association, the Cotton Exchange, the Produce Exchange, the Ship-owners' Association, and the Council of Political Reform, was held yesterday at the Chamber of Commerce. The Chairman, Mr. Ambrose Snow, called the meeting to order. The report of the Committee on "the cost and practicability of stone bulkheads" was taken from the table, when Mr. Gustav Schwab alluded to some criticisms of that report made by Mr. Wales, President of the Dock Department. He maintained that, while the figures obtained for that report were necessarily procured in an indirect way, they were not exaggerated or misstatements of fact, but he believed they would be found to be essentially correct. Mr. John F. Henry suggested that Mr. Wales be invited to meet the conference and give them an opportunity to hear what he had to say about the subject. Mr. Opdyke thought it was due to the conference that the Commissioners should explain the assertion of gross errors in the estimate of the Conference Committee, as that committee were driven by the careless methods of book-keeping in the Dock Department to their indirect methods of ascertaining the cost of stone bulkheads. Mr. Wales asks the committee to meet him at the Dock Department and give him an opportunity to explain the expenditures on account of the docks. A resolution that the report of the committee be referred back to the committee, in order to give an opportunity for conference with the Dock Commissioners, and that then it should be reported again to the conference, was adopted.

Mr. Opdyke reported that Committee No. 4, on "the propriety of selling the whole or part of the City dock property," would hold a meeting on Monday next and make a final decision, and that it would then be prepared to report.

Mr. Seth Low made a report for the committee appointed to investigate the subject of "the proper width of the streets bordering on the water front of the City and the necessary facilities for commerce." After alluding to the greater facilities which the geographical form and position of other cities afforded for the approach of railroads to those ports, and the saving effected by shipping merchandise to them, the committee report that the problem now is how best to bring the railroad cars of all the roads to the heart of the City. The readiest way, in the opinion of the committee, would be to make the streets on the water front of such width as to permit all necessary railroad accommodations. The legal width of West street, as fixed by the Commission of 1871, is 250 feet, and as a portion of the bulkhead has been built upon this line in stone, it would seem wise to retain the line of 250 feet from the easterly side of West street. For the rest of the streets, southward, and for the river street northward, it is the opinion of the committee that 200 feet would be a sufficient width for the purposes of commerce. They also recommend that the Legislature, in view of the cost of filling in and the importance of keeping the river way as free as possible, repeal the present bulkhead line except where the line is already completed between Canal and West Eleventh streets, and they recommend that it be asked to fix the line in the rest of the street northward and eastward at 240 feet. For the water street on the East River, they recommend that the bulkhead line be fixed at 100 feet from the westerly line of the street, as the necessity for great width is less urgent than upon the North River. It is assumed by the committee that the streets when widened, shall receive a double-track freight railroad, with necessary switches and turnouts, for the use of all railroads having depots in the City, so that cars from floats can be easily rolled to any business part of the City. It is believed by the committee that a single track thus placed in some of the streets down town, which run at right angles with the river, being thus connected with the remotest parts of the County, would develop facilities for the cheap handling and transportation of merchandise, the importance of which can hardly be overestimated. The committee do not doubt that the traffic of such a railway can be regulated so as to harmonize with other demands upon the streets. They insist that if the improvements are to be of practical value, they must be completed with expedition and at moderate cost. The plan of the Department of Docks for stone bulkheads is considered by the committee as too slow and expensive, and they recommend that the Legislature be petitioned to repeal it. The report of Committee No. 1 is approved, and the belief is expressed that if the crib bulkheads recommended in that report be adopted, West street could be widened at the rate of 2,500 running feet per annum without interfering with commerce, and without devoting too great an expense upon the City. The bulkhead line of 1857 exists for the greater part of its length on West street, say the committee, only upon paper, and the efforts of the conference should, they advise, be directed to securing in fact and at once the erection of the bulkhead line upon such lines as the Legislature may finally establish. With the streets as they are, the committee believe that the Belt Railroad can and ought to be used at night for freighting purposes by steam, and the measure is urged as one of great and immediate importance. They recommend, also, that steps be taken to ascertain whether any of the existing obstructions of the river streets are illegal, with a view to compelling the removal of all obstructions not sanctioned by law. The report is signed by Jeremiah P. Robinson, James M. Requa, Thomas Scott, John P. Townsend, and Seth Low.

The report was received and consideration delayed until a future meeting. On motion of Mr. W. H. Webb, the committee were directed to prepare a plan of the streets designated in their report, with the proposed improvements indicated, and present it to the conference.

After some discussion of the report of Committee No. 1, the meeting adjourned.

THE CITY DEMOCRACY.

MEETING OF THE TAMMANY HALL GENERAL COMMITTEE—APPOINTMENT OF STANDING COMMITEES FOR THE ENSUING YEAR.

The Tammany General Committee for 1877 held its first regular meeting at the Fourteenth street head-quarters last evening, Henry L. Clinton in the chair. The Chairman delivered an address, in which he referred to three epochs in the history of the country which, he said, "seemed fraught with deadly peril to republican institutions." The first "nullification threatened to dismember the country," and was "throttled by the far-seeing wisdom and invincible firmness of a Democratic President—Andrew Jackson;" but a "gigantic civil war drenched the land in blood." After the sacrifice of "hundreds upon hundreds of thousands of lives and the expenditure of thousands of millions of dollars," the "world was made to believe that our Government could not be destroyed, but that, on the contrary, it had gathered fresh strength—new life—from a four years' war sufficient to rend in twain—if not to utterly destroy—any other Government upon the face of the earth. "Last of all" was the recent Presidential election, which he claimed had resulted in the choice by the people of the Democratic candidate, that a civil war would have been prevented, "perchance," a war which would have ended in "the establishment of a monarchical or military government," if the calamity had not been averted by the appointment of the Electoral Commission by Congress. Whatever decision might be arrived at by that tribunal, he said, would be cordially acquiesced in by the entire people.

The following standing committees for the year were appointed:

Committee on Correspondence—Menzo Diefendorf, Louis C. Waehner, George L. Dosser, Thomas C. E. Ecclesine, George W. McGlynn, Frank A. O'Donnel, Robert A. Van Wyck.

The meeting then adjourned.

THE RESUMPTION OF SPECIE PAYMENTS.

THE PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE DELAYED ON ACCOUNT OF THE ILLNESS OF SECRETARY MORRILL—AN ELABORATE PRESENTATION OF THE FINANCIAL CONDITION OF THE COUNTRY EXPECTED.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 2.—Secretary Morrill has been confined to his room by a temporary illness for two or three days, and it is understood that the President's special Message on the resumption of specie payments has been delayed in consequence. It is not determined when it will be sent to Congress, but certainly in a few days. The Message is likely to be rather an elaborate presentation of the financial condition of the country and the ability of the Treasury, aided by proper legislation, to resume at the present time. The advantages of immediate resumption to the business interests of the country will be discussed. The improbability of any action by this Congress in behalf of resumption is, however, as great as ever.

THE STEAMBOAT REGULATIONS.

PROCEEDINGS OF THE SURERVISING INSPECTORS—MORE STRINGENT RULES ADOPTED—DISMISSAL OF A LOCAL INSPECTOR.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 2.—The Board of Supervising Inspectors of Steam-boats, which have been in session here for the past ten days, completed their labors and adjourned to-day. During the session the board revised the rules and regulations governing local steam-boat inspectors, in which they have made many changes. More stringent rules have been adopted with reference to safety valves and the rules regulating the issuing of special permits for steam-boats carrying excursions. Heretofore a special permit issued for a particular excursion was made by steam-boat Captains to cover an entire season. The new rules upon this subject require an application for special permit to be made for each excursion. All steam-boats carrying passengers at night will hereafter be required to keep one man upon watch at all times during the night, at or near the wheel-house, so as to guard against accident through any incapacity on the part of pilots, through ignorance, neglect of duty, or other cause. The regulations adopted in 1871 providing a system of fog signals for sailing vessels has been rescinded, and hereafter on this class of vessels fog signals will be governed by the regulations of the Navigation Bureau and the Revised Statutes.

James H. McCord, local Inspector of Steam-boat Boilers at St. Louis, was dismissed by the board for misappropriation of public funds.

A CONGRESSMAN CONFUSED.

THE LOUISIANA RETURNING BOARD INVESTIGATION—MR. FIELD'S WITNESS PROVES A FAILURE—GEN. ANDERSON'S VICTORY OVER A BULLYING CONGRESSMAN—$200,000 OFFERED WITNESS TO COUNT THE STATE FOR TILDEN.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 2.—Mr. David Dudley Field did not have everything his own way to-day. In the first place, his pet witness, Mr. Maddox, was not able to produce the letter which he has repeatedly sworn was written by Gov. Wells to Senator West. This was bad enough, and poor Mr. Field was terribly put out; but when Gen. Anderson, of the Returning Board, was placed upon the stand, and began to testify, his anger knew no bounds. For in this gentleman he met a witness who was more than a match for him. Gen. Anderson was not afraid of the loud-mouthed reformer, and, unlike the unfortunate gentlemen who have gone before him, returned Mr. Field's arrogant and overbearing insolence with interest. Aside from this his testimony was very important. He swore positively that he knew nothing, and had never heard anything of the one million dollar proposition related by Maddox. Further than this, he also swore that to his knowledge there had been no change made in the Vernon return as related by Mr. Field's friend, Littlefield. But this was not all; he did not simply contradict and disprove the lying evidence of the Tilden witnesses, but swore, with much emphasis and much to Mr. Field's discomfiture, that State Senator Robertson, of Louisiana, a Democrat and a prominent Tilden agent, had offered him $200,000 if he would have the State counted for the Democratic candidate. This offer Gen. Anderson declined, and commanded Robertson never again to make such a proposition to him. David Dudley, in his usual bullying style, tried to break down this testimony, but failing to do so he lost his temper and made himself very ridiculous. Regarding the evidence of Littlefield, a number of witnesses now on their way from New-Orleans will testify on Monday. They will prove that the Vernon return was stolen and altered by him, and that another return from that parish which he wrote was substituted in the place of the one so abstracted. Gov. Wells will probably be called to-morrow. He will contradict the story told by Maddox in the most conclusive way, and will swear positively that he never wrote any such letter as that described by Field's witness. He defies him or his principal to produce such a document.

MADDOX ACTED "ON BROAD MORAL GROUNDS"—GEN. ANDERSON OFFERED $200,000 TO GIVE THE STATE TO THE DEMOCRATS.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 2.—The Committee on the Powers, Privileges and Duties of the House in Counting the Electoral Vote to-day resumed the examination of Mr. Maddox, who, in response to questions by Mr. Burchard, said that after he came to Washington, and before he went South, about the 10th of November, he had several interviews with Col. Pickett. While in New-Orleans he spoke to several Democrats, but the remarks were of a general character. He did, however, have interviews with Judge Walker, who proposed to introduce him to Baldwin & Co. on business concerning the vote of Louisiana. He did not make the proposition on that subject until after he had had an interview with Secretary Cameron. Mr. McDill called the attention of the witness to the telegram signed Joseph Hancock, dated New-Orleans, Dec. 1, and addressed by Col. Pickett, as follows: "Telegraph party to trust person you wrote about. May be to your interest." Mr. McDill asked who was the "party" alluded to, and the witness answered Col. Zacharie. The witness said he was desirous of producing the letters called for by the committee, namely, from Gov. Wells to Senator West, and from Gov. Wells to Mr. Maddox. In reply to Mr. Burchard witness said that no proposition had been made to him or any one else to deliver the letters for a money consideration. He asked for further time to produce them. To designate where they were might jeopard their production. He required no money for their production and would take none.

Q.—Did you not agree to take a share of the $1,000,000 proposed to be raised by you and Col. Pickett to affect the Louisiana returns, and now you say you would not take any money for producing the letters? A.—I thought it not immoral to buy a right. The witness stated during the further examination that the letters were in the hands of a prominent Republican.

Messrs. Burchard and Seelye desired that the name of the party be given, in order that a subpœna might be issued for the production of the letters. The witness was allowed till to-morrow morning to produce the letters.

Mr. Seelye—Did you not enter into a double game to turn over the State of Louisiana to either the Democratic or Republican Party, whichever should furnish $1,000,000? A.—When I went to New-Orleans it was with a view of examining the canvass for myself; I became satisfied that the vote of the State had been cast for the Democratic Party, the election having been as fair as any that could be held; I had some sympathy for the people there; I found that they had been trampled on and oppressed, and their substance being taken away, and after my interviews with Gov. Wells I was satisfied that his proposition to his Northern friends could not be met; I did not wish it to be met, but I wished that the after proposition should be carried out; I acted on broad moral grounds; thought it was better for the people to buy their rights than lose them; it was a part of my game to appear to encourage Gov. Wells. The witness referred to attacks on him in the newspapers, and expressed his gratification that they now gave him an opportunity to protect his character. In explanation of his testimony given yesterday the witness said he delivered a letter to President Grant from Gov. Wells, which was intended to be submitted to the Cabinet; Gov. Wells wanted protection in the discharge of his duties; the President said that Gov. Wells should receive such protection, and remarked that he wanted a fair count and an honest declaration of the vote. The witness during the examination about his business said that the Treasury Department was satisfied with his official duties as a revenue agent, and that several times his compensation had been increased; he had not been, as charged, convicted of an infamous crime in Baltimore; he was arrested there in connection with stock transactions, but the charge was dismissed by the Grand Jury; he was arrested for negotiating stock supposed to be a forgery, but it was afterward ascertained the stock was genuine.

GEN. ANDERSON'S TESTIMONY.

Gen. Anderson, of the Returning Board, testified as to the sessions of the board being public and attended by visiting members of the Republican and Democratic Parties; each side had stenographers to report the proceedings; when the board went into executive session it was for the purpose of considering the statements of Supervisors and affidavits bearing upon the returns; only the officials of the board were present at the compilation of the votes. Mr. Burchard interrogated the witness with regard to certain affidavits appended to a former special Message of the President on Louisiana affairs charging intimidation, &c. Witness was satisfied from recollection that those affidavits were before the board; he remembered the names of two of the affiants, namely, Mr. Lane and Mr. Clover, the latter a Supervisor of Registration; the witness said that to his knowledge there was no change in the vote of Vernon Parish to elect Senator Kelso, a Republican; he was not present in the board when the official returns from that parish were opened; the result was, however, in favor of Hunter as District Judge; the witness had always looked upon Hunter as a Democrat; he was formerly Treasurer of the State; Andrews was declared District Attorney; he believed Andrews to be a Democrat, as he belonged to a Democratic family; the witness did not know of the destruction of the official returns of Vernon or any other parish; was not aware of any alterations of returns, and never had any conversation with any fellow-member of the board regarding the alteration or destruction of returns. The witness, in response to Mr. Lawrence, said that he had known Mr. Maddox 25 years, but not intimately.

Q.—Did you have any conversation with him during the time the Returning Board were engaged in their labors last Fall? A.—None whatever; the only conversation I ever had with him was to say "Good morning," and shake hands with him; I never had two minutes' talk with him; I did not hear in New-Orleans of any proposition from Gov. Wells to sell out the State or anything connected with such a thing.

Q.—Did you meet with Mr. Maddox in Gov. Wells' private room? A.—I did not meet him in Gov. Wells' room, my own room, or any other room.

Q.—Did Maddox say anything about the use of money to affect the result of the election? A.—Nothing about money or the result of the election.

Q.—Did Gov. Wells give you any intimation of any conversations he had with Mr. Maddox? A.—None whatever.

Q.—Do you know of any negotiation, arrangement, or proposition with which Maddox was connected? A.—I do not.

Q.—Did you ever hear of any proposition from Gov. Wells that there be raised $200,000 for him and $200,000 for you? A.—I never heard of it till mentioned here.

Q.—Is it true that he also wanted smaller sums for the negroes? A.—I never heard.

Q.—Is it a fact that negroes are on the board? A.—There are two said to be colored persons—Kenner and Casanave.

Mr. Field—That was no detriment to them, but only to Gov. Wells, if he used that language.

Q.—Was there any proposition made by any one in relation to the use of money to affect the declaration of the result? A.—Yes, Sir; do you wish to know his name?

Mr. Lawrence—Give it.

The witness then said: A gentleman, Dr. W. A. Robeson, a State Senator, came to my room at 11 o'clock at night and said to me that there was an opportunity to make a good thing, and that I would get $200,000 if I would insure the State for the Democrats; I replied that was a subject I did not wish to entertain; he asked me to think over it; I replied that it would be useless for me to do so, and before he left the room he exacted a promise from me to meet him at the St. Charles Hotel at 5 o'clock the next evening; I promised to meet him in order to get rid of him; I did not meet him; he came to the board and called me out, inquiring why I did not meet him; I said I had forgotten the engagement, when he replied it was too important for me to forget; I said to him, I do not want you to converse any further with me on the subject, if you wish to retain my friendship you will never again mention it.

Q.—What are Dr. Robeson's politics? A.—He is a Democratic Senator.

Q.—What time was this? A.—I think on the 24th or 25th of November.

Gen. Anderson was interrogated at length by Mr. Field and other Democrats, and was asked if a good many of the affidavits as to intimidation, &c., were made in New-Orleans, to which question he replied: "A large number were sworn to in that city."

Q.—Were not these affidavits prepared long subsequent to the 24 hours required by law? A.—I do not know how many days after the 24 hours. The witness said he did not know that Andrews declined the office of District Attorney, for the reason that he was elected by the changes in the returns, and not by the people; nor did he know that Mr. Andrews ever wrote a letter to that effect; the witness said the Returning Board threw out certain votes, believing that in doing so they were sustained by the law and the evidence; they did this without regard to party politics.

Mr. Field—Did you know you threw out more Tilden than Hayes votes? A.—We knew it after the result was ascertained.

Q.—Did you know this while you were doing it? A.—I cannot say we did.

Q.—While you were throwing out parishes did you not know it would affect the Presidential election? A.—I did not.

Q.—Did you not declare you would not serve as a member of the Legislature if the vote was declared in your favor? A.—The reason for making such a declaration was because of some inquiry relative to the Parish of Lafayette, the returns not having been sent in at that time; witness was a candidate in that parish, and had said he knew he was not elected, and therefore would not serve if he was returned as elected.

Q.—Had you any reason for thinking that the board would return you if you were not elected? A.—It was because I heard it whispered about that I would be returned that I said I would not take my seat.

Q.—Is Dr. Robeson, who offered you a bribe, still your friend? A.—I do not regard him as my enemy; I do not think I have seen him since.

Q.—Do you not think that a man who would offer you a bribe was a bad man? A.—I think it was very improper in him.

Q.—But do you not think it was very dishonest? A.—I do.

Q.—Did you turn Dr. Robeson out of your room? A.—I got rid of him by promising to meet him at the St. Charles Hotel, but did not go there.

Q.—Did you express your detestation of the offer? A.—I told him I did not approve it, and not to mention it to me again.

The committee then adjourned until to-morrow morning.

THE WITNESS MADDOX.

HOW HE ATTEMPTED TO SECURE INFORMATION IN NEW-ORLEANS—HIS RECORD DURING THE WAR.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

BALTIMORE, Feb. 2.—Mr. C. Irving Ditty, of this city, who was lately appointed by President Grant as one of the committee to visit New-Orleans and investigate affairs in Louisiana, has sent to the Baltimore Gazette a letter for publication in that journal to-morrow, in which the antecedents of the witness Maddox are recounted and his true character exposed. After effectually disposing of the charge made by the Gazette that he [Mr. Ditty] had visited New-Orleans at the expense of the Custom-house, he asserts that there is nothing in the testimony of Littlefield, Pickett, or Maddox to change his opinion as to the integrity of the Louisiana Returning Board. According to Littlefield's testimony the alteration of the returns from Vernon Parish was made after they had been examined by the board, in the presence of the Republican and Democratic visitors, and in order to count in certain friends of Gov. Wells. Vernon Parish and the clerk of its court are Democratic, and the Democrats had triplicate returns from that as from all other parishes which, when opened by the Returning Board, in the presence of the visitors from both parties, were found to be correct. As those official returns were, according to the testimony, altered after this examination it would, he considers, have been the height of folly to have made such an alteration. Coming next to Mr. Maddox, Mr. Ditty says he introduced himself to him (Ditty) at the St. Charles Hotel in New-Orleans. Mr. Ditty did not at first recognize him as the Maddox of blockade running and Parkersburg notoriety, but as a gentleman who had for a long time occupied a pew in St. Luke's Protestant Episcopal Church in Baltimore. A few days after the introduction, he, by invitation, dined with Maddox, and was surprised to hear he was an agent of the United States Revenue Department, having believed him to be a Democrat. Maddox informed him that his business in New-Orleans, ostensibly in the interests of his office, was a sham; that he was a secret confidential agent of President Grant to spy out the political situation; that he would communicate frequently with the President, and would show Mr. Ditty his first report before he sent it; that the President relied entirely and implicitly upon him, and would shape his Louisiana policy according to his (Maddox's) report; that everybody there thought him a strong Democrat, and he had got a great deal of useful information which he could not give openly to the committee, because it would destroy his usefulness; that he could talk freely with Mr. Ditty, as, both being from the same city, no remark would be made, and that he would like to be introduced to Senator Sherman and Gen. Garfield. Mr. Ditty, however, surmised his true character, and determined not to introduce him. On several subsequent occasions Maddox repeated the same statement. Mr. Ditty did not mention the matter to Gen. Garfield, and only alluded to it to Senator Sherman, who remarked that such a man was probably a scoundrel. Maddox next told Mr. Ditty that he had sent one report to the President and would soon send another, which he would first show him. Mr. Ditty intimated that people had begun to be curious as to what his position really was, and shortly afterward Maddox disappeared from New-Orleans.

Mr. Ditty then proceeds to show that in the Winter of 1864–65 his regiment, the First Maryland Cavalry, Confederate States Army, was encamped at Hanover Junction, Va., under command of Gen. Bradley T. Johnson. The men were in need of clothing, and about $40,000 was raised by friends and invested in tobacco, under Gen. Johnson's directions. This tobacco was sent, under a military detail, to the northern neck of Virginia, thence across the Potomac to Maddox, in St. Mary's County, Md. Maddox had agreed to sell it and return the proceeds in uniform cloth. The men who guarded the tobacco were ordered to wait for the cloth, and bring it to camp. After some time they returned, and reported that the tobacco had been seized by the United States Government, on the secret information, as they were told and believed, of Maddox.

Mr. Ditty says he can also prove that Maddox, under orders of President Davis, Nov. 13 and 17, 1864, contracted with Confederates in arms to furnish them, in the manner above stated, with military supplies, and that in whichever light it may be viewed—whether as violating his faith with the United States Government or betraying the trust of the Confederates, he is equally unworthy of credit. Mr. Ditty concludes: "Nobody in Baltimore who knows Maddox would take his statements on the Louisiana, or any other matter, as in themselves worth anything."

THE LOUISIANA ELECTION.

THE REPORT OF THE SENATE COMMITTEE TO BE PRESENTED IN A FEW DAYS—HOW A FAIR AND PEACEABLE ELECTION WOULD HAVE RESULTED—THE EXCESSES OF THE MAN LITTLEFIELD.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 2.—The Senate Committee that investigated the Louisiana election will report in a few days. They have carefully examined all the questions regarding the five so-called bull-dozed parishes, and the other districts where intimidation was practiced, and their report will show that if a fair and peaceable election had been held Hayes and Wheeler would have carried the State by a decided majority.

Dispatch to the Associated Press.

The Senate Committee, of which Mr. Howe is Chairman, and who are investigating the conduct of the late election in Louisiana, examined to-day Mr. J. F. Littlefield, one of the Clerks of the Louisiana Returning Board, who, in a statement made a few days ago before the Morrison Committee of the House, confessed having changed the figures on the returns from Vernon Parish, Louisiana, so that the votes cast for Democrats at polls two and nine of this parish were counted for Republicans. In his testimony to-day Mr. Littlefield stated that the return, figures of which were altered by himself, came into the hands of the Morrison Investigating Committee through his uncle, Mr. Spearing, to whom witness gave the return. He also stated that Mr. Spearing is a Republican, but a Nicholls man, that he gave the return to Spearing without compensation, that a few days before doing so Spearing had introduced witness to a man named Gifford, a bank examiner, and witness told Spearing in the presence of Gifford of the existence of the return which had been changed. Gifford told witness if he would go to Washington with him the Secretary of the Treasury would give him [Gifford] $100,000 for the return. Witness would not go because he would not set a price on himself. He was not for sale. He regretted what he had done, and wanted to get out of the difficulty without having it known that he had changed the figures on a return. He afterward stated that the $100,000 was to come from the Secretary of the National Party or the Treasurer of the Republican Committee. When he went from New-Orleans to Springfield, Ill., he was accompanied by Mr. Spearing and by Mr. Murphy, a lawyer and a Democrat. He stated that he refused to testify before the Morrison Committee on the first day of his appearance before them, but on the second day he told all, because Gen. Huribut, of the Morrison Committee, had tried, on the first day of witness' examination, to prove that he (witness) had stolen the return which had come into the possession of the committee through Spearing, and witness had to tell all to clear himself of the suspicions cast upon him; Marshal Pickin offered to obtain witness a lawyer with whom to consult on the evening of the first day of witness' examination, but he declined the offer. Mr. Murphy, the same person who had gone with witness and Spearing to see Gov. Palmer at Springfield, Ill., was consulted by witness, and through him he (witness) learned that he would not lay himself liable to criminal prosecution for having changed the figures on the returns from Vernon Parish, if he testified under protest to having done so. At 4 o'clock Mr. Littlefield stated that he did not feel able to continue longer on the witness stand and he was excused, and the committee adjourned until to-morrow morning.

ARGUMENT IN THE FLORIDA CASE.

THE OBJECTORS ON BOTH SIDES HEARD BY THE ELECTORAL COMMISSION—DUDLEY FIELD "SAT DOWN UPON" BY THE TRIBUNAL—AN OFFICIOUS DISPOSITION TO SPEAK FOR EVERYBODY SUMMARILY SUPPRESSED—THE DEMOCRATIC ARGUMENT TO GO BEHIND THE GGVERNOR'S CERTIFICATE—ABLE REPLIES OF MESSRS. KASSON AND M'CRARY.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 2.—The meetings of the Electoral Commission are by no means interesting to the ordinary visitor to the Supreme Court room, though some very able and clearly-stated arguments were made before the Commission to-day. The scene is much the same as on an ordinary court day, except that the number of people sitting on the bench is greater, and they do not wear gowns. This seems all right in the case of Senators and Representatives, but the Justices look odd without their gowns. The portly form of Justice Clifford, particularly, loses dignity by the absence of the judicial robes. There was never a case represented before the Supreme Court itself by such able and distinguished counsel, not to mention McCrary, Tucker, Kasson, and Field, of the House, who are dispatched with the killing phrase of "objectors." There are Charles O'Conor and Jere Black, on the Democratic side, and Evarts, Stoughton and Mathews, for the Republicans, with assistant or associate counsel hardly less eminent. Mr. Evarts spent most of the four hours of argument by the objectors writing at his table, but he evidently kept close attention upon the arguments at the same time, for often he stopped his writing to make some whispered comment to Mr. Stoughton upon the points of the speakers on either side. Mr. Mathews, in the latter part of the day, was busy with his pen, but most of the other counsel were only taking occasional notes. Charles O'Conor appeared to be very feeble, and while he was the central figure among the Democratic counsel, it is doubtful if he will be able to do more than to advise his associates.

David Dudley Field appears as the great Tilden manager. This is said to be largely an assumed function, and he was "sat down upon," if that expressive phrase may be used, this afternoon, by Judge Clifford and Senator Edmunds jointly. At the close of arguments by the objectors, Justice Clifford directed a question specifically to counsel. Field immediately assumed to answer, but Justice Clifford remarked that the Commission would be better satisfied if the counsel should answer. There was a whispered consultation among attorneys, and Mr Field presently tried to answer again. Senator Edmunds inquired whether he spoke as an objector, or as one of the counsel, and receiving answer that Mr. Field was speaking as an objector, Mr. Edmunds said that the time of objectors had expired, and the Commission was now desirous of hearing from counsel. Field began to understand that he was dealing with men who were not afraid of him, and he was no more heard from.

Mr. Field and Randolph Tucker made the argument for the objectors against the counting of the Hayes votes. It was agreed between them that each should speak an hour, but Mr. Field at the expiration of his time had not concluded, and the chivalrous son of Virginia told him to take all the time he desired. Mr. Field accordingly continued a quarter of an hour longer. His speech was not an argument, but an appeal, or rather a kind of direction to the Commission as if it were a jury. He assumed that Florida had given its votes for Tilden Electors, and the wicked Republicans had stolen it for Hayes. The Hayes certificate was a thing hateful to touch even, but nevertheless he did take it in his hand and held it up to the light and declared it to be "black with crime." This assertion the sober old gentlemen composing the Commission will gravely investigate. Mr. Field indulged in a little surprising rhetoric with respect to the statue of Washington being turned toward the rising sun, or something to that effect, and he mentioned the removal of the Goddess of Liberty from the dome of the Capitol, but gave no valid reasons therefor. Randolph Tucker, with the "wild exuberance of a child of the sunny South," wanted the Commission to dive down into the slimy filth and unkennel the tremendous frauds. The arguments addressed to the grave tribunal by Field and Tucker, are said to have properly presented the Democratic position, but they were certainly not particularly impressive.

In the arguments to-day the Republicans are generally conceded to have been best represented. Mr. Kasson, in beginning, cleared away much of the rubbish with which Field had attempted to cover up the real questions at issue. He addressed himself to the true questions, and in a plain, straightforward, logical speech showed the regularity of the Hayes certificate, and the irregularity and illegality of the others. He attempted less to exhibit the objections to counting the Tilden vote than to prove that the Hayes vote should be counted. He showed into what a series of difficulties the attempt to canvass the vote of the State for Electors would lead the Commission, and made it clear that if the question of how the State voted were to be explored back of the executive certificate, the Commission could not stop with the allegations of Field on one hand, but must examine the allegations upon the other side. This would involve the Commission in a labor that would not be terminated by the 4th of March. Mr. Kasson claiming that the Commission had precisely the same powers as the two houses of Congress in counting the vote, and went into an argument to show that that power was narrowly ministerial. Mr. McCrary made a close legal argument, citing many authorities directed to showing the uselessness of the quo warranto proceedings in the Florida courts, of which Field had attempted to make so much. Mr. McCrary exploded effectually the notion that a quo warranto proceeding could have any effect to invalidate the actions' of officers against whom the writ is brought, until the judgment is rendered; nor could it after the term of the officer has expired. The function of the Electors having terminated when they cast their votes, no proceedings now could invalidate that action. Mr. McCrary's argument was very clear and conclusive on this point, and in connection with this argument he assailed successfully Mr. Fields' proposition that the Commission was possessed, in this proceeding, of all the powers of a court of general jurisdiction, hearing a quo warranto proceeding.

The Commission will meet again to-morrow morning, at 10:30 o'clock. The important question of what testimony shall be admitted and considered by the Commission will then be raised, and the formal offer of evidence will probably be made by the counsel of the Democratic side. There was no definite determining of the manner of proceeding to-night, but probably the counsel will make out and present a schedule of the evidence they wish to have considered and the facts they expect to prove. On the Republican side there will be no offer of evidence, but the claim will be made that, if evidence is to be admitted on the Democratic side, the privilege of meeting it shall be accorded the Republicans. The counsel have the choice of reserving their arguments till the questions touching the admission of evidence have been decided by the Commission, or of continuing their arguments now, and leaving the question of evidence to be afterward decided. This is so important a matter that the counsel will be likely to make their arguments before that question is determined. It is not yet definitely known who will speak, but it is understood Charles O'Conor will be heard, if he is in sufficient health, and Messrs. Stoughton and Evarts will probably speak on the Republican side.

There is, of course, great anxiety and a vast amount of speculation as to the probable action of the Commission in the Florida case. It is pretty generally agreed among lawyers of both parties that the decision of the very first question—that concerning the hearing of evidence—will carry along with it a determination of the main result. If the Commission should decide not to go into an examination of the election of Electors, the vote of Florida and of Louisiana will certainly be counted for Hayes, and the only hope of the Democracy would be in Oregon. Some of them seem to suppose the Commission may decide to count but two votes from that State, but lawyers do not expect such a result. If the Commission should determine to go behind the returns, then there will be no result from the last Presidential election, for there is no time to hear the evidence. The almost universal belief is that the Commission must either elect Hayes, or that its action will compel a new election by postponing a determination till after the 4th of March. As to the probability of the Commission going behind the returns, that can be guessed anywhere and by anybody, as well as by the wisest man in Washington.

PROCEEDINGS OF THE COMMISSION.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 2.—The Electoral Commission met at 10:30 A. M. The Presiding Justice stated that the inquiry had been made yesterday, "What is the case?" to which he had taken the liberty to respond that it consisted of three certificates from the State of Florida, with the accompanying papers, and the objections to the same. He would now say that two of the objectors on each side will be allowed to speak in the opening of the case. Those representing the objections to certificate No. 1 would first speak. He reminded them that the fortieth rule allows them two hours in which to state the case and argue in support of their objection. Then two objectors upon the other side would speak, subject to the same views and limitations.

Representative Field—I desire to inquire whether, after the two objectors have spoken for the other side, we shall not be allowed the opportunity of replying?

The Presiding Justice—The rules make no provision for any reply on the part of the objectors. Applications for further time must be made to the Commission, the Presiding Justice having no discretion in the matter whatever. My view of the matter is that one of the counsel for the objectors to certificate No. 1 should open, and that one of the counsel in favor of that certificate and against the objectors should reply; and then the other counsel supporting the objections to certificate No. 1 will have the floor.

Mr. Kasson remarked that while his side had no objection to proceeding, as far as the objections to the first certificate were concerned, this morning, his associate and himself finding more questions involved in the objections to that certificate than it was supposed would be found, and not having had an opportunity to examine them until this forenoon, he thought it was probable his side would be obliged to ask the court for some little time before proceeding.

The Presiding Justice—The suggestion calls for no ruling. Counsel on behalf of the objectors for certificate No. 1 will proceed. I shall for convenience designate the certificates respectively Nos. 1, 2, and 3.

Representative Field—Before proceeding, if the Commission will allow me, I would refer to a preliminary matter. I observe that rule 5 speaks of testimony. Though I am in some doubt about the course of proceeding, if evidence is admissible, I think it should be stated to the court before beginning the argument that we are prepared to state at the bar, or in any manner the court may indicate, by deposition or otherwise, all that is necessary to prove the allegations in our objections. We suppose that the papers which are to be presented here contain sufficient evidence for all purposes, but I ought to state that I do not propose to proceed with the argument under the impression that we have no other evidence on which we rely, saving, of course, the question whether the evidence is competent or not. I wish to say that we can produce testimony here, or anywhere, or in any manner that the Commission may direct, and offer to do it, in proof of our case now, or at any other time, or in any other manner.

Judge Strong—It seems to me that the rules we have adopted place the objectors in precisely the same position as that of counsel who opens a case before it is submitted to the jury. We propose that the objectors shall occupy exactly that position. In their direct statement of their objections they will state what their objections are and how they propose to support them. If other questions will come up afterward in regard to the admissibility of evidence, and the other counsel will reply.

Representative Field—That, of course, will be entirely satisfactory to us.

FIRST DEMOCRATIC OBJECTOR.

Mr. Field then, on behalf of the objectors, addressed the Commission. He said:

MR. PRESIDENT AND GENTLEMEN OF THE ELECTORAL COMMISSION: It will be my endeavor in the statements which I make to set forth with as much conciseness as I may the facts which we expect to prove and the propositions which we expect to establish. The power devolved by the Federal Constitution upon the States of the Union was in the State of Florida exercised by the Electors of the State, directly appointed by the qualified voters of the State at the general election. That election was held on the 7th day of November, 1876. It was quiet and orderly, so far as we are informed, throughout the State, and it remained only to gather the returns of the votes. The result of the voting was a majority in favor of the Electors whom, for convenience only—for I would rather not speak of candidates or persons—I will designate as the "Tilden Electors." Nevertheless, a certificate comes here signed by the then Governor of the State, certifying that the Hayes Electors had a majority of votes. By what sort of jugglery that result was accomplished I now take it upon myself to explain. By the law of the State of Florida, the counties are divided into precincts, and the votes of the polling precincts are returned to the County Clerk, where they are canvassed by certain officials, and these County Canvassers certify to the State Canvassers.

Mr. Field then read from the evidence of Andrew A. Allen, Sheriff of Baker County, Fla., to the effect that he and Judge Driggers went to the Clerk's office of Baker County at about 6 o'clock in the evening, knowing that the Clerk was not in the office, and knowing also that the Clerk had already made the canvass of the votes. The witness testified that he and Judge Driggers threw away the Johnsville and Darbyville Precincts because they believed that one person had been prevented from voting; that they had no evidence whatever before them of that fact except the statement of the party and an impression, the result of general rumor that, some illegal votes had been cast. Mr. Field said that the whole question, so far as concerns the State of Florida, rests upon such statements as he had read, and the whole question of law and fact presented to the Commission is whether or not, in the face of such statements as those, a paper signed M. L. Stearns, certifying that certain persons were elected to office when there is no truth in the statement, is to be received as binding upon this body. He reviewed at some length the action of the Florida Returning Board and of ex-Gov. Stearns, and commented the people of Florida for the patience and forbearance which they had displayed in the emergency. "They resorted," said he, "as all law-abiding citizens should resort, to the courts of their State, and the courts decided that the State Canvassers had no power, under the laws of Florida, to throw out any votes; that they were bound to count every lawful vote put into the ballot-box; that the Returning Board were neither Electors nor Judges, otherwise than as to what votes were put in." The Supreme Court of Florida, therefore, he continued, pronounced the action of the Returning Board illegal, and Gov. Drew took his place and is now the lawful and accepted Governor of the State of Florida. If there be any mode known to law by which a defrauded State can, through its courts of law, right any wrongs which it may suffer, that mode has been adopted in Florida. Referring to the vote for President and Vice President, Mr. Field explained that there were three certificates on returns from that State. Return No. 1, made by the Hayes Electors and bearing the certificate of Stearns as Governor; return No. 2, signed by the Tilden Electors without the certificate of the Governor, but with a certificate of the Attorney General, (the only dissenting member of the Board of Canvassers,) certifying that they were elected, and return No. 3, containing the action of the State authorities subsequent to the first two returns for the purpose of receiving and confirming (so far as it was possible for the State thereupon to do it) the second return. We are told that the certificate forwarded to Washington with the signature of Gov. Stearns attached, is the true certificate, and that no matter what documentary evidence may be found to invalidate that certificate, it still remains binding. It is to that statement that Mr. Field proposed to devote the remainder of his remarks.

The form, said he, in which the point is stated, is erroneous, and should be made to read: "Can the certificate go behind the truth and conceal it?" There is no pretense that the true and lawful vote of the State of Florida was not given for the Tilden Electors, but the sole pretext is that the truth cannot be proved as against the certificate of Gov. Stearns; that the truth is rolled up and concealed in that certificate, and that Congress, whether acting in separate houses or in joint house, cannot consider any act which is certified by Stearns. You may ask, in the first place, what foundation that is; you are told that you are to take that certificate as conclusive evidence against everything that could be proved on the other side. By what rule of evidence, by what doctrine of law are you deprived of the right to examine into the truth? Is it not a universal rule that every Judge is invested ex necessitate with power to take all pertinent evidence in respect to the facts upon which his judgment is to be pronounced, unless there be some positive law declaring that one certificate in any case, documentary evidence shall be conclusive? "Show me," said Mr. Field, "the positive law which makes the certificate of Stearns evidence against the truth. Where is it? It is not in the Constitution, that is certain. It is not in the laws of the State of Florida, that is certain. Is it in any act of Congress? The only law I know of bearing on it is the act of 1792, re-enacted in the Revised Statutes, which states that the Executive of the State shall deliver to the Electors a certificate that they are the Electors; but it does not state that it shall be the truth. Suppose I offer to prove that the certificate is wholly false and fabricated for the purpose of cheating? Take one of the oldest and proudest States of this Union, the State of Massachusetts, of which my friend Mr. Commissioner Abbott is so worthy a Representative. Suppose that the honored Governor of that State should become satisfied that the power to certify that in the recent election the Tilden Electors had received a majority of the votes of the people of Massachusetts. Does any man mean to tell me that you cannot prove that certificate to be false? Where is the law to support such a statement? Nay, more; if an act of Congress had declared that that certificate should be conclusive that act would be unconstitutional, and for this reason the Constitution declares or asserts that the person having the highest number of votes shall be the President, not the person declared to have the highest number of votes. You cannot, therefore, manufacture a certificate to take from the person actually having the highest number of votes such rights as he is entitled to by those votes, and if you were by an act of Congress to declare in the most positive terms that the certificate of the Governor should be conclusive against all proof, you would transcend the limits of organic law. You cannot say that the certificate of the Governor of Massachusetts, for example, should override the votes of the Electors of Massachusetts. You could not do so if you would, and I am sure you would not if you could. The language of the act of Congress is not so strong as the language of the State law generally as to the canvass of votes. Take the case of Wisconsin. There a law of the State had declared that the State Canvassers should determine, certify, and declare the result—should declare who was Governor. A man got into the office of Governor upon such a certificate declaring that he was elected. A rival claimant brought up the case upon a writ of quo warranto. The first party had his position and claims advocated by the ablest counsel of the State of Wisconsin. His argument was: You cannot inquire into the case, because the certificate of the State Canvassers is conclusive. No, says the court, in an opinion which does them immortal honor, and which will remain a living monument to the patriotism of that court and its inflexible determination of purpose as long as the report shall last—the title of the Governor depends upon the votes of the people; upon those little ballots placed in the ballot-boxes, declaring the supreme will of the people. It is not who shall be certified by a Board of Canvassers, but who have been voted for by the people. The court declared that the claimant was entitled to the office, and it ejected the usurping Governor.

What is this Commission to do? It is to declare whether any and what votes are votes provided by the Constitution, and not to declare what are those votes certified by Gov. Stearns. You are to certify what are the lawful votes upon which a President of forty-five millions of people is to be declared elected and to be inducted into office. Is it not implied that a writ of quo warranto to try the title of the President of the United States is within the purview of the Constitution? Can anybody doubt it? The Constitution has declared that the person having the highest number of votes shall be the President—not the person certified to. It has not invested any tribunal with exclusive power. No matter how determined by any preliminary authority, there still remains the right to enact a law giving a right to the exercise of the writ of quo warranto. No such law exists, I am sorry to say; and if I might be permitted to say so, it ought to exist. I ought not to say, perhaps, but I must say it in truth, that it is no small reproach to our statesmanship that for 100 years no law has been provided to meet the emergency with which we are now brought face to face. I know that one eminent member of this Commission [Senator Morton] has labored assiduously and zealously to have such a law passed, and of all the t ties to which he can ever lay claim for respect I am sure that that will be remembered hereafter by his house; and after the struggles of the passing hour have closed, when the time shall have come when men may look at his grave, they will not remember him by the contests in which he was engaged, but rather that in the service of his country he labored, although hitherto unavailingly, to achieve a beneficent result. But whether there be a law entitling to a writ of quo warranto or not, in the case of a President, I think all parties will agree that such a law would be constitutional, and if a law to provide for a writ quo warranto would be constitutional, then it is constitutional for any other tribunal sitting in the place of a high tribunal under that writ to investigate a title; that is to say, if you can devolve that title upon any tribunal which you could create and you have not created any have been a Republic. The proceedings in the courts recited in it are all subsequent to that time, which, by the Constitution and laws of the United States, is the time fixed for the performance of judicial functions. These two certificates are wanting in all the elements of the constitutional and legal validity which should give them a place before this Commission in the condition in which the laws of the country by which the Constitution and laws of the United States were on the 6th day of December, when these functions were exercised. Furthermore, if certificate No. 1 is a constitutional and legal expression of the vote of the State of Florida, of course that question being settled in favor of certificate No. 1 obviates all necessity for considering certificates Nos. 2 and 3, and I ought perhaps to say to the honorable Commission that it is fortunate they did not grant the request of the objectors to adjourn until to-morrow. The next mail might have brought to you certificate No. 4, reciting new proceedings and new action before the courts, and no end would be found to the papers that might be presented in party or personal interest as establishing a retroactive right to exercising a function in the State of Florida. I shall now chiefly confine the argument to certificate No. 1, because if the objections to that certificate are invalid, and the certificate itself is valid, that being recognized dismisses all consideration of the other certificates, and we shall ascertain what is the constitutional and legal vote of the State of Florida. The objections to this certificate are substantially one, namely, that there was a fraudulent return. That it was fraudulently issued, not by reason of anything which appears in the action of the certification, or presenting of the certificate, but because of the action of the people. And hence it is that we have heard this morning, chiefly, instead of a constitutional and legal presentative of the question, an argument before this Commission as a jury in a court have to pass, not to determine law, to determine facts, to decide rights between parties, to decide State rights, to decide national rights—an argument, I say, that somebody somewhere has acted fraudulently, and that this return has been vitiated.

It is not, however, within the scope of my purpose to answer generally the argument that took most of the time of the objector who opened this case. I must say, however, to this Commission that instead, as suggested by the first objector, we do not on this side agree with the views presented by him with respect to the facts. For example, when he refers to Baker County I not only dissent from his views of the facts as of record in that case, but I say that if you go into that question of Baker County, and if that fact which he alleged be true, to wit, that somebody laughed on a proposition being made to canvass those votes, we shall naturally say that you go into Jackson County, where under the political domination there were rejected 271 votes given for the other candidate, and that poll, we certainly claim, was entirely vitiated by that rejection. I should ask you to go into another county where you would find that a railroad train full of passengers stopped on its passage through the county, and the passengers got off and voted the ticket supported by my friend who makes the allegation about fraud in Baker County. I should ask you to go into other counties where you would find the poll vitiated by the stuffing of ballot-boxes. We further answer the allegation that these things have not been denied by us by stating that we propose to show that there was such a case of fraud in the incipiency of that vote as would astonish not only this Commission, but the whole country, by its presentation. I unite with my friends in condemning fraud wherever it exists. It should vitiate not only the poll, but the action of every human being who participates in it. We are not here to defend fraud. We are here, however, to say not only that the allegation made on the other side is not sufficiently correct, but the step in the examination of the question confronts you with some of the grossest cases of violation of popular rights that have ever been heard of in the history of this country. If we are to seek out fraud, let us go to the bottom of it. Let us go where that fraud is found in such degree and in such force as to penetrate the very foundation of the popular sovereignty of this country, and to lead every patriot to consider whether the highest duty of legislators is not first to put their guard where alone fraud is essentially to be feared, because it is further removed from the sight of the general public. But I leave that question now. I do not believe that this Commission, by the Constitution or law, was ever intended or has the power to go to the extent that would be required to probe these mutual allegations on both sides to the bottom. I find also that our honorable friends on the other side have been misled by the judicial atmosphere of this hall, consecrated usually to the jurisdiction of a judicial court, and under the influence of these columns and the associations of this room they have addressed you, honorable gentlemen of this Commission, as if you were a court vested with the powers to try causes; vested with the powers of a subordinate court in proceedings by a writ of quo warranto; vested with the determination of the rights of holding office; and they have presented to you these questions upon which it is absolutely necessary to come to a decision: First, is this Commission a general canvassing board, with power to recanvass the public vote of the State of Florida? Second, is this Commission a national Court of Appeal from the State Canvassing Board? Third, is this Commission a judicial Court of Appeal from the other side Circuit Court of Florida in proceedings by a writ of quo warranto?

The gentlemen on the other side affirm that your jurisdiction was coextensive with that of a court in a proceeding by quo warranto, and I add the fact in response to the facts alleged on the other side—which have the decision of this subordinate court—Judge White's court in Florida—as the final determination of that question of quo warranto, that we are informed and so claim the fact to be that it is now pending on appeal in the Supreme Court of the State of Florida, after a regular appeal from the Circuit Court, after the proceedings of quo warranto. Now, the affirmative of all these propositions is taken by our opponents. They do affirm that you are a Canvassing Board, with power to recanvass the vote of Florida cast by the people. They do affirm that you are not merely a Canvassing Board, but a national Court of Appeal from the action of the Canvassing Board. They do affirm that you are a court so judicial that from the action of the State Circuit Court of Florida you can take jurisdiction in revie wing their action. They do affirm that there is no limit to your power to investigate into the honesty and integrity of the action of the Canvassing Board of Florida and determining it originally with the powers of a court to whom the certificate by election should have been given. Now this represents the legal position of our opponents. I ask, therefore, what are the powers of this Commission? I need not remind the honorable gentlemen composing it that the assumption of those powers implies that we are to have no election of a President and Vice President inside the length of time limited for that purpose. You cannot say to those gentlemen, "We will go behind the regular certificates provided by the Constitution and laws just so far as to find whether what you allege to be fraud is or is not fraud." We must, if we go behind them, go where all fraud is asserted to be. It is the popular vote that those gentlemen say you will review. Where did this Commission get its power from? By the act organizing the Commission you are vested with the right to consider just so much of this case as I quoted in my remarks. Let me ask, then, what is that, in order to clear our hands from what within the last two or three years has grown to be a most dangerous aspect of the rights of States and people, namely, an assertion of the unlimited power, over all things and questions having a national aspect, of the two bodies comprising the Congress of the United States. No such thing was intended by the Constitution. The same power which under the Constitution justifies Congress in saying that the counting shall be done by this Commission, would have justified them in saying that the counting should be done by the President of the Senate. Admitting that Congress has the power so to arrange it, we must guide ourselves by the same principles of jurisdiction that you yourselves would assert, surrounded by the simple power of the Constitution. If the President of the Senate alone should count the votes. If the Constitution had said, "and the vote shall then be counted by him," the same result would have been reached. If instead of "by him" you use the two words "by Congress," you do not improve the matter at all. Whatever Congress has to do, that is to be done by the President of the Senate or by the two houses of Congress. If you maintain that the President of the Senate should count the votes, that he has the right to send out Commissioners to take depositions, to seek evidence, to recanvass the popular vote of Florida, to organize the whole machinery, alike of the Executive Canvassing Boards of the State and of the Judicial boards of the State, is there a gentleman in this Commission, from either house of Congress, or on the Supreme Bench, who would for a moment tolerate such power under the simple language, "shall count the vote?" If not, then the act has given no additional power to 15 men, outside of the power which by the like terms would have been conferred upon one man. Hence, I say, there is in this law no power to do more than is necessarily implied in the words, "Count the vote." That being so, we come to the next question, What does it mean? And is the power of that sort that implies something not ministerial? With the narrow circuit of discretion that belongs to the ministerial power, does it, as gentlemen on the other side claim, give the unlimited power of review? If it does, your Constitution in its very framework and organization is violated. The first three articles of the Federal Constitution relating to the functions of this Government made them legislative, executive, and judicial, and affirm positively that the judicial functions are vested in a certain body, namely, the Supreme Court, and in inferior tribunals, just as legislation is vested in the Congress of the United States, just as executive power is vested in the President. The lines are drawn in the Constitution of your country, which tells you that the mutual powers of the Government in the three great powers shall not be merged or mingled in a tribunal either made up of the three or made up of any two of the three. The safety of our people hangs upon it; the safety of our States hangs upon it; all the elements of national safety hang upon the observation of that great step in modern civilization—great as compared with the ancient—that takes from one department of Government all duties except those pertaining to its principal branch. The claim made on the other side merges them, and says that you are to exercise judicial functions. The claim made this morning maintains that your powers are co-existent with the powers of a court on a writ of quo warranto. I think it may be assumed that the language of the act creating this Commission confers no such powers upon it, organized as it is to tide over a difficulty, and to do this ministerial act of counting the votes.

I have spoken of the narrow circuit of discretion that surrounds the ministerial act of counting. I beg to renew the distinction that there is no difference made by adding the words "By Congress" at the end of the constitutionly clause, so that it would read "shall then be counted by Congress." It is the same as if the words were added "shall then be counted by him," meaning the President of the Senate. The essential of the phrase is the count. What is that narrow circle? It is to ascertain the count—the certified votes under the Constitution and law that ought to be counted, not in the sense claimed, but in a ministerial sense. Do they upon their face contain evidence of fraud, of error? Is certificate No. 2 more regular, more free from fraud, more worthy of being received, than certificate No. 1? Is certificate No. 3 a better certificate, or does it bear greater evidence of authenticity than the other? If so, take it; it is an authentic certificate on return. Neither Congress nor any other power has the right to count the popular votes, for the Constitution says distinctly that it is the Electoral vote which is to be counted. Are you to revise the proceedings of all State elections and State tribunals appointed by State laws, or are you to count what is properly certified and presented to you? If it be otherwise, let the Constitution be amended, and let it be declared by this triounal to be amended, so that it shall read, "Each State shall appoint in such manner as the Legislature thereof may direct a number of Electors, subject to revision by the Congress of the United States, which shall have power to determine whether such Electors have performed their functions to the satisfaction of said Congress." We are brought inevitably to an amendment to the Constitution which sought to preserve absolutely the rights of the States, which required every ballot in the Presidential election to be cast on the same day, that they might be freed from centralized influence. Every member of the Commission knows the history of the adoption of this clause, and yet we are brought perpetually, I say, to the question: Shall we now go on and complete the absorption of the absolute independent right of the States to appoint the Electors in their own way, and say that it is subject to the two houses of Congress whether they have done or shall do what is necessary. The gentlemen ask, are we, then, to take the certificate of the Governor against the vote? Is there reason on the other hand why it should not be asked, are we to take the certificate of 15 gentlemen against the truth? There is back of the necessity of public affairs an absolute necessity to have some final jurisdiction in order that there shall be, somewhere, authority by which we stand, even if it be unlawful. Where is the authority? Is it here? Is it in the State Legislature? If not, where is it? I submit that for the purposes of this case under the Constitution and laws, that authority exists where the State authority ends, and that if that action conforms to the statutes of the State and of the United States, there is the determination of the result.

It has been said that the courts had decided finally this quo warranto case in Florida. There is no evidence in the records of the court that that fact is true. I have read the decision and I say there is not an allusion to the fact that the Canvassing Board acted fraudulently. It was alleged that that action, which had conformed to the action of two years before, was a misinterpretation of the rights of the board. In the documents submitted a few minutes ago to the Commissioners there is a certain section of the laws to the language of which I call your attention. It is this: "If any such returns shall be shown or shall appear to be irregular, false, or fraudulent, and the board shall be unable to determine the true vote for any such officer or member, they shall so certify, and shall not include such return in their determination." That is the statute by which the election was held Feb. 27, 1872, and was the law in force at the time of the canvass, and at the date of the certificate of the Electors, and at the day of the vote for the Electors, and until the 17th of January, 1877. Then it will be seen that the Canvassing Board of Florida were to inquire whether those returns appeared to be so fraudulent that the board could not count the vote. In exercising that function they not merely passed upon the returns of the county canvass, but the certified returns in precincts. The courts said they had overstepped the law. I must say, while I think of it, in the gentleman composing the Commission, that it will further appear that when they made the recanvass, which I style canvass No. 2, under the order of the Supreme Court of the State of Florida, they there reported not only the result with respect to State officers but they also reported the result in respect to the Electors, and that result showed the election of what by common consent we style, after the names of the candidates, the Hayes Electors. They appear to have run two or three hundred votes ahead of the State ticket; that left the State ticket still two or three hundred majority. That appears by the record. It does not appear on the printed record, however, submitted by the gentlemen on the other side, I suppose, because the court ruled that what they intended only applied to State officers, and therefore they struck it out after it had gone in; but it was a part of the proceedings of the court. I say that not only will canvass No. 2 show the election of the Hayes' Electors, but canvass No. 2, which was had in accordance with the ruling of the Supreme Court, will also show, not only the election of the Democratic State candidates, but the election of the Hayes Electors also.

Mr. Commissioner Bout—Was that called in question in the case of Drew against Stearns?

Mr. Kasson—It was in the proceedings in respect to the rights of the board, and the canvass had on the order of the court made in that case shows both sides of the Electoral College and of the State officers, and showed the result of that count when applied to both. The objection was taken as we say.

Representative Field—Please state, that in the recanvass this Canvassing Board put back Baker County so as to include only two precincts.

Mr. Kasson—That is only to say that the gentlemen on the other side wanted in so much of their action as suited their case, and wanted to reject the rest. The board applied the rule and determined the result; made changes in counties both ways. It put back some Republican votes and some Democratic votes. I only mention it here because the printed proceedings do not mention all points. Now we come to canvass No. 3. There you find that, not including it at all, they appointed a new Board of Canvassers. From that new board they rejected the Attorney General of the State, whose opinions had been (as to the law of the case) in many points of the canvass with the Republican members of the Board. In spite of the Attorney General the Governor made a menace to the Returning Board, he was left out, and the Treasurer of the State put in his stead.

After some further remarks with reference to canvass No. 3, Mr. Kasson continued: Mr. Field proposed in his argument to show the jugglery by which the Hayes Electors got their certificates. May I ask this tribunal if there is a prima facie presumption for or against fraud, whether it exists against those officers elected before fraud could have been contemplated; against a board that acted at the time required by the State law; against a board that acted at the time required by Congressional law; against a board that acted in ignorance of the result in other States? Or does that presumption of fraud exist against men who know the presumption of the change of the result in Florida; against men who acted with the knowledge of the necessity of the action they took to accomplish their result; against men who were organized as a new tribunal and enacted a new law to accomplish that result? If there be fraud—if there be conspiracy, as alleged—where does the presumption of law under these circumstances place it? Inevitably it places it where the motive of the act, the knowledge requisite to give motive effect, and the purpose to be accomplished were all before the eyes of the persons participant in it. Fraud cannot be so presumed against parties that act in conformity with law and in the discharge of a duty at the time required by law and in the manner required by law, as it can be presumed against those who did it outside of the provisions of the law and with a full knowledge of the effect which would be produced by it. My honorable friend from Virginia [Mr. Tucker] in his argument spoke of the fact, which was unsupported by any evidence, but which, he said, he could support by some evidence, that there was a bad motive and bad conduct on the part of this Canvassing Board. Of that I have seen no evidence whatever. But he went further, and asked, are we to submit this great question of the supreme magistracy of the United States to the determination of a trio of oligarchs in Florida? A trio of oligarchs? What shall I say of the quartet of oligarchs in my State who exercise corresponding functions? What shall I say of the quartet or quintet of oligarchs that exists in every State in this Union, which is empowered in a similar manner, and having probably the same rights as a Canvassing Board? Nay, more, I should like to ask my honorable friend, what shall I say of this solo oligarch in Oregon? Is there any significance in giving a name of this sort to a tribunal that is acting under and because of the provisions of the Constitution and laws of the United States and of the State? I answer that the question is, where does the law put the power to arrive at that determination in which action is based? Whether that be in one man, in three men, or in five men, the determination is prima facie evidence, and can be vitiated only in the manner provided by the laws of the local original jurisdiction, as the case may be. The case is made when it is found to be in accordance with the Constitution and law in time, manner, and due certification of authenticity. Can it be upset? Yes. Where? Has the gentleman suggested? No answer within the jurisdiction which the laws provide for the determination of the right. But, says the gentleman, suppose no such provision of law is made? Then I answer that absence of authority is no reason for a usurpation where that act has not in its support a scintilla of Constitution or law. If the allegation is true it simply shows the necessity of further legislation where that legislation ought to exist. If it be not true the whole of the argument here falls to the ground. The Constitution says that we have very little to do with this matter of elections in a State. The history of the Constitution shows that it was intended that we should have very little to do with the determination. With such matters it gave us no authority to overthrow State action, and the alleged right to change a duly certified result somehow within itself the right, without investigation of the motive, to deny to the States that very right which the Constitution took such extraordinary pains to confine exclusively within the province of the State. If you have the right to say that another set of votes must be counted in Florida, you have the right to say that another set of votes must be counted in New-York. If you take jurisdiction to determine the mere 90 votes which constitute one of the alleged majorities in Florida, and to upset the Electoral College that might exist there, you might go to my State and assert that the 60,000 majority there should be upset.

Commissioner Thurman asked Mr. Kasson whether he meant his argument to be understood as stating that if the State of Florida had elected four Electors who were laboring under the disabilities covered by the fourteenth amendment, and those Electors had cast their vote for President of the United States, the Commission would be bound to count such votes?

Mr. Kasson—I suppose that Congress, under its power to give effect by legislation to constitutional provisions, might probably provide by law for the investigation of the question of personal and constitutional disqualification by judicial adjudication, because it is a judicial proceeding in its nature, not executive or legislative. But without such legislation it is not, in my judgment, a question to be considered on the record, and the question cannot be tried as an accident of the count by either an executive or legislative board.

After some further remarks Mr. Kasson took his seat.

Mr. McCrary followed, reviewing the quo warranto case already referred to, and reciting many authorities in connection therewith.

The Presiding Justice inquired whether counsel proposed to offer evidence before proceeding to the argument.

It was replied on behalf of Mr. O'Conor that he expected to offer evidence; that indeed he had supposed the evidence was already before the Commission within the necessity of further offer.

Mr. Justice Miller suggested that counsel might make a brief synopsis or statement of what they proposed to offer instead of offering it in detail.

The Presiding Justice asked Mr. Evarts if he intended on his side to offer any evidence.

Mr. Evarts said that he had no evidence to offer, unless there should be a determination to admit evidence against his side, which he should then need to meet.

The Presiding Justice—If the Commission decide to receive evidence, you would require to meet that evidence?

Mr. Evarts—Yes, Sir, especially relating to this particular matter of Humphrey, and whenever it is intended to show that Humphrey held an office we shall perhaps desire to give evidence that he did not hold that office at the time referred to, and we suppose if there is to be an inquiry which addresses evidence, that evidence is to be proved according to the rules which make its production evidence—the system of common law.

Mr. Commissioner Thurman suggested that there must be a great many facts as to which counsel upon both sides could agree, not as to whether proof of them is admissable in this proceeding, but as to the existence of the facts. It counsel would agree as far as they could in respect to facts of which there could be no possible doubt, leaving the question of their admissibility as a matter of law to the decision of the tribunal, it would very much tend to save time.

The Commission at 5 o'clock adjourned until 10:30 to-morrow morning.

ASSOCIATE COUNSEL ENGAGED.

CHICAGO, Feb. 2.—Hon James P. Root, of this city, has been invited to act as associate counsel to the Arbitration Commission on the Republican side, and left last night for Washington.

A WOMAN'S STRUGGLE FOR HER LIFE.

The Cardiff (Wales) Weekly Times of Jan. 20 says: "One night last week, during the prevalence of the severe floods, the servants of Mr. Powell, Waungron, heard screams proceed from the outside premises. On going in the direction of the sound, they found an elderly woman lying on the ground close to a wall. The poor woman, who was insensible at that time, appeared to be in a deplorable condition, in a state of great prostration, and her clothes saturated with water from head to feet. Mr. Powell acted the good Samaritan, and had her conveyed into the house, where she soon recovered consciousness and was made comfortable for the night. On the following morning the woman told her story, which, from its romantic features, seems on the face of it almost incredible, but we believe its truthfulness has since been verified. The woman, who is 68 years of age, stated that she lived at Barmouth, in Merionetshire, and a few days previously had left that place with the intention of walking to Swansea to see her sister. She traveled in the right direction for Aberystwith, where she duly arrived; but after this she took a wrong road, and wandered along the coast, passing near Cardigan, thence on by way of Newport and Fishguard, and at length found herself at Haverfordwest with only a couple of pence in her pocket. Being put in the right direction, she continued to walk to Swansea, and reached the neighborhood after dark. She wandered about the roads at the back of Waungron, and was several times up to her neck in water, but by struggling hard for her life she at length reached a wall which she climbed, and from the summit of which she fell exhausted into Mr. Powell's premises, where she was found in the manner we have described. Mr. Powell got her comfortably housed for a day or two, and when her strength had sufficiently recruited he paid her railway fare to Swansea. Of course the woman having told so remarkable a story was considered an imposter by most persons, but from inquiries which have been made, her statement turns out to be correct, and further, the poor woman succeeded in finding her sister at the end of her memorable journey."

A CANDIDATE FOR ASSEMBLY.

George W. Seward, of Orange County, the surviving brother of ex-Gov. Seward, responds as follows to an invitation from the Goshen Democrat for a "self-sacrificing patriot" to come forward as a Republican candidate for member of Assembly in the Second District of that county, to fill a vacancy:

FLORIDA, Friday, Jan. 25, 1877.

Editors of the Democrat:

In your edition of the 25th you say that "If some self-sacrificing patriot will come forward and permit the use of his name as a candidate for the Assembly, at the special election, you will be glad to announce it in your next paper." I take the opportunity to announce myself as a candidate. Strange things happen sometimes in a political history, and this will be so regarded. The most popular sometimes are sometimes beaten, at others the most unpopular elected. And is it not strange that no Republican is willing to be a candidate—none willing to endure the sacrifice? Why, it is not treating the Democrats with due respect, thus to leave them in an "open course." Announce me then as a candidate. It won't hurt me "narr a red" if I am defeated, and if elected the district might do worse, nor would it make my fortune. Respectfully yours,

GEORGE W. SEWARD.

THE TELEPHONE.

HISTORY OF THE INSTRUMENT AND ITS INVENTOR—A CONVERSATION BY WIRE ON WEDNESDAY BETWEEN BOSTON AND A NEIGHBORING TOWN—THE "LAST ROSE OF SUMMER" SUNG BY TELEGRAPH.

From the Boston Transcript, Feb. 1.

At noon yesterday a distinguished party of gentlemen were assembled at the office of the Boston Rubber Shoe Company on Congress street in order to witness a series of experiments performed on the telephone between the inventor, Prof. A. Graham Bell, here, and his associate, Mr. Thomas A. Watson, at the residence of Mr. Converse at Malden, about six miles distant. Prof. Bell had been invited by some of our most prominent citizens to give a practical demonstration of the most recent developments of an invention which, in accordance with its name, has already sounded far and wide the fame of the telephone.

The telephone, in its present form, consists of a powerful compound, permanent magnet, to the poles of which are attached ordinary telegraph coils of insulated wire. In front of the poles, surrounded by these coils of wire, is placed a diaphragm of iron. A mouthpiece is so contrived as to concentrate upon this diaphragm substantially completes the arrangement. As is well known, the motion of steel or iron in front of the poles of a magnet creates a current of electricity in coils surrounding the poles of the magnet, and the duration of this current of electricity coincides with the duration of the motion of the steel or iron moved or vibrated in the proximity of the magnet. When the human voice causes the diaphragm to vibrate, electrical undulations are induced in the coils environing the magnets, precisely analogous to the undulations of the air produced by that voice. These coils are connected with the line wire, which may be of any length, provided the insulation be good. The undulations which are induced in these coils travel through the line wire, and, passing through the coils of an instrument of precisely similar construction at the distant station, are again resolved into air undulations by the diaphragm of this instrument.

The simplicity of Prof. Bell's system will be apparent when it is known that the voltaic battery is entirely dispensed with. All that is required for communicating between the most distant points are the instruments and the telegraph wire, the latter taking the place of the speaking tube, and the former that of the mouth-pieces. The short distance which separated Messrs. Bell and Watson in their experiments yesterday must by no means be considered a gauge of the powers of the instrument, as any effect produced by electricity over a short wire can with equal facility be produced over one extending 100 or 1,000, for that matter, 1,000 miles, provided, of course, that the insulation be good. In fact, the inventors have already conversed through an artificial resistance far exceeding that of any of the Atlantic cables. Although to the uninitiated this might seem to imply that sensation could be carried on across the Atlantic by this means, yet as all electricians and men of science are aware, there are other elements entering into the consideration of such a problem besides that of mere resistance. As a proof of the rapid progress made in this science, it may be stated that it is only within the past few months that the instrument has been sufficiently perfected to allow of free and easy conversation taking place through this new vehicle.

It would perhaps be wearisome were we to narrate at length the various phases through which this invention has passed. The history of all important inventions is the same. It is only after years of weary, patient toil, of successive failures and discouragements, and of constant silent watching, that a man can hope successfully to develop the product of his brain and his intelligence. This has been the case with Prof. Bell, who, by birth a Scotchman, came to Boston from Canada in 1872. In the following year he was offered and accepted the Professorship of Vocal Physiology at the Boston University. This was chiefly owing to the fame enjoyed both by Prof. Bell and by his father as teachers of this much-neglected science in Europe. The Bell system of physiological symbols has been so thoroughly successful in this country as to completely revolutionize the methods of instructing the deaf and dumb, and within the last six months four new schools for this special purpose have been opened, in Michigan, Maine, Illinois, and New-York, while the system has also been introduced into a large proportion of the establishments of this class already existing in the United States.

Besides its beneficent influence on those persons deprived of the ordinary faculties of hearing and speaking, the Bell system has very largely facilitated the acquirement by Europeans of such languages as Chinese, Japanese, Cingalese, and the Polynesian dialect, because this circumstance because it is simply as a result of the constant attention paid by Prof. Bell to the mechanism of the human voice, both in instructing teachers and in directly ameliorating the condition of the deaf and dumb, that he has devised his telephonic system.

The experiments yesterday were as follows: Telephones having been connected with the private telegraphic line of the Boston Rubber Shoe Company, and the operators at either end having taken up their station, conversation was at once commenced. Stationed at the Boston end of the wire, Prof. Bell requested Mr. Watson to speak in loud tones, with a view to enabling the entire company at once to distinguish the sounds.

This was so successful that a smile of mingled pleasure and surprise played on the features of those present. That it, however, might not be supposed that loud speaking was essential to intelligible speech, Prof. Bell explained that soft sound could be heard across the wires even more distinctly than loud utterances, even a whisper being audible. In confirmation of this statement, Mr. Watson commenced speaking in turn with each member of the company, and after the efficiency of this method had been proved to the satisfaction of all, he took up a newspaper and informed the assemblage that gold had closed the previous evening at New-York at 105⅝. As there were quite a number of business men present, the effect that this practical demonstration of the value of the telephone produced can scarcely be exaggerated. Other passages from the daily journals were then given, and by this time the hours for conversation having become general, Mr. Watson was plied with questions such as, Is it thawing or freezing at Malden? Who will be the next President? &c. It was remarkable that Mr. Watson was able to distinguish between the voices at the Boston end, he calling at least one gentleman by name as soon as the latter commenced speaking.

This went on for some time, until a lady at the Malden end sent the company an invitation to lunch per telephone, and an appropriate response was made by the same medium. At length the company were requested to remain quiet while a lady at the other end conveyed to them the sweet strains of music. The assemblage thereupon listened with rapt attention while a young lady commenced singing "The Last Rose of Summer." The effect was simply charming. Possessing, as the fair cantatrice does, a voice of exquisite sweetness, the sounds penetrated into the Boston end of the telephone with a distinctness equal to that attainable in the more distant parts of a large concert room, and a unanimous vote of thanks was sent by the latter to the instrument which had procured for the assemblage so agreeable an hour. Among those present were electricians and gentlemen occupying prominent positions on our Western railroads, and one and all expressed the conviction that the telephone was destined to achieve the greatest possible results. Let us hope that the day is fast approaching when every man will be in a position to turn on the electricity in his house with the same facility with which he now turns on the water or the gas.

AN ABSENT-MINDED FARMER.

The Kingston Freeman tells the following story: "An absent-minded farmer resides in the the town of Olive. He generally depends upon his wife, not only to conduct the affairs within doors, but also expects her to keep an eye on all the farming implements, such as plows, mowing-machines, axes, shovels, hoes, &c., that are liable to go astray. A few days ago he actually came to the house and made the following inquiry of his better half: 'Sarah Mariar, have you any idee where them barn doors is?' It seems he had been butchering, and to facilitate the work, had removed from their hinges the small doors of the barn, and had forgotten what he had done with them, so he brought 'Sarah Mariar' ought to know, and she did, taking the gentleman by the arm and showing them to him. With a puzzled expression on his face, he looked at the doors several minutes, and then gave expression: 'Waal, I declar, I never would have found them if it hadn't a been fur you Mariar!'"

A THIEF IN THE QUEBEC POST OFFICE.

The Quebec Mercury of Monday says: "Owing to the loss of several letters containing money, detective aid was lately called in to the assistance of the Post Office Inspector. Besides letters containing money, others have been missed, including small parcels containing silk handkerchiefs, jewelry, &c. By means of a letter posted on Saturday night the detectives came to the conclusion that the guilty party was a French clerk, whose duty it was to receive the letters as they were posted in the receiving box, take them up stairs, and aid in assorting them. The private investigation opened this morning, and the abstraction of letters and parcels from the Post Office has been going on ever since July last. The authorities are very reticent as to what is going on. The prisoner was arrested last night, is 23 years of age, and was removed from head-quarters to Quebec in April last. He was in receipt of a salary from the office of $520 a year. He is a married man, with a family of three children, and resides in St. Sauveur."

THE CAPITAL OF ARIZONA.

The San Francisco Call says: "There has for a long time been a spirited contest in Arizona over the question of removing the Territorial capital from Tucson to Prescott. Sectional animosity entered largely into the dispute, but by a compromise of some of the conflicting views, a bill was finally got through the Legislature accomplishing the removal, which Gov. Safford signed, and Prescott has at last attained the object of her ambition. She had the argument decidedly in her favor in point of geographical centrality, a large population and greater general business activity."

THE CITY SAVINGS BANKS.

REPORTS MADE TO THE BANKING DEPARTMENT.

CONDITION OF TEN OF THE INSTITUTIONS—CONSIDERABLE FALLING OFF IN AMOUNT DUE DEPOSITORS—DECREASE IN THE NUMBER OF OPEN ACCOUNTS—INCREASE IN THE "SURPLUS" ACCOUNT—RESOURCES AND LIABILITIES.

We give below the annual reports of ten of the savings banks of this City. These reports are made to the Superintendent of the Banking Department in accordance with the provisions of the General Savings Bank law, and are each verified under oath by the respective Presidents and Secretaries of the institutions. We also give the amounts reported by the same institutions Jan. 1, 1876, under three of the most important heads, viz.: "Due depositors," "Surplus," and "Number of open accounts." The reason for not making the comparison with the last July statements is that the reports for July were not sworn to, but simply certified by one of the officers of the banks. There are at present 34 savings banks doing business in this City, two of which are virtually closed, viz., the National Savings Institution and the Equitable Savings Bank. On Jan. 1, 1876, 40 savings banks of this City reported to the Superintendent of the Bank Department. The six which have ceased doing business within the last year are the Abingdon Square, Bond Street, Mechanics' and Traders', New-Amsterdam, Security, and Traders', all of which are in the hands of Receivers. As to the business of the banks during 1876, the reports thus far received indicate that there will be a considerable falling off in "amount due depositors," with a corresponding decrease in "number of open accounts," while the item "surplus" has consider ably increased.

FORTY-FOURTH CONGRESS.

SECOND SESSION.....Feb. 2.

SUMMARY OF THE DAY'S PROCEEDINGS.

In the Senate the bill relating to public accounts and claims was taken up and passed. It provides that claims that may be examined and decided by heads of bureaus shall be barred unless presented within six years after they accrued, and the chief object is to secure a statute of limitations to the matter of claims. An adverse report from the Naval Committee on the application to reinstate Midshipman Beale, dismissed from the Naval Academy for "hazing," was made. A bill for the relief of a Southern bank, against which judgment was obtained for Confederate money deposited in it when seized by Gen. Banks in 1863, was discussed and recommitted.

The House met at 10 A. M. and took a recess till 11:40. An amendment to the Electoral Vote act, providing that either house may order an adjournment while engaged in legislative business, till 10 A. M. the next day, was recommitted to the Committee on Rules. The Legislative Appropriation bill was considered in committee of the whole. The clause in the first section fixing the salaries of Senators and Representatives at $4,500, was struck out. Twelve pages were disposed of.

SENATE.

The Senate having ordered a recess yesterday afternoon until 10 o'clock this morning reassembled at that hour, with half a dozen Senators present, and immediately took a recess until 12 o'clock.

THE TAX ON BANK DEPOSITS AND CAPITAL.

On reassembling, numerous petitions asking the passage of a law to repeal the tax imposed on bank deposits and capital were presented and referred to the Committee on Finance.

A STATUTE OF LIMITATIONS FOR CLAIMS.

Mr. SHERMAN called up the Senate bill relating to public accounts and claims. It provides that all claims against the United States which the accounting officers of the Treasury or the heads of any department or bureau are authorized to examine and decide shall be barred unless presented within six years from the time the same accrued. Claims existing which would be barred by the act or within two years after it goes into effect, may be presented within four years from the passage of the act. It also forbids the head of any department to consider a claim while the same is pending before Congress, and provides that pensions on any official bonds may, after the expiration of the term of office of the principal, demand an examination and settlement of the accounts of such principal, and if the principal shall be found to be in default that suit must be brought against the sureties within two years.

In explanation of the bill, Mr. SHERMAN said the chief object of it was to secure a statute of limitations, so that claims against the Government could not be presented after six years. The bill was not intended to apply to claims before the Southern Claims Commission, the Court of Claims, or Congress.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Iowa, submitted an amendment, providing that nothing in the act shall be construed to revive any demand or claim which is already barred by an existing statute. Agreed to.

The bill was then read a third time and passed.

HAZING IN THE NAVAL ACADEMY.

Mr. SARGENT, of California, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported adversely on the application of Midshipman Beale to be reinstated at the Naval Academy, he having been dismissed for hazing. Ordered to be printed.

COUNTERFEITING COINS.

Mr. SARGENT also introduced a bill to amend an act amending section 5,457 of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to counterfeiting. Referred to the Committee on Finance.

It provides that any person making, causing to be made, or aiding and assisting in making, forging, or counterfeiting any coin or bars in resemblance or similitude of the gold or silver coins or bars which have been, or hereafter may be, coined or stamped at the Mints and Assay Offices of the United States, or in any semblance or similitude of any foreign gold or silver coin or bars which now is, or hereafter may be, made current in the United States, shall be punished by a fine of not more than $5,000, and by imprisonment at hard labor for a term not exceeding 10 years.

A CLAIM FOR CONFEDERATE MONEY SEIZED BY GEN. BANKS.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, called up the Senate bill for the relief of the Union National Bank of Louisiana, successor to the Union Bank of Louisiana. It authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to pay said bank $36,873 39, the sum on deposit in the Union Bank of Louisiana belonging to the Planters' Bank of Tennessee, which was seized by Gen. Banks on the 17th of August, 1863. During the discussion it was stated that the Planters' Bank had sued and obtained judgment against the Union Bank, which judgment had been paid.

Mr. COCKRELL, of Missouri, inquired if the money seized was not in Confederate notes, and were they not now in the Treasury of the United States.

Messrs. SHERMAN, INGALLS, MORRILL, and others opposed the bill, and Messrs. CAMERON, BOGY, and others spoke in favor of it, stating that the Supreme Court had declared the act of Gen. Banks in seizing the money to be illegal. As the Union National Bank had to pay the judgment the Government should make the amount good.

Mr. SHERMAN moved that the bill be indefinitely postponed, which motion was rejected by a vote of 20 yeas to 24 nays.

After some further discussion the bill was recommitted to the Committee on Claims.

The Senate, at 5:10 P. M., took a recess until 10 o'clock to-morrow morning.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The House was called to order at 10 o'clock, with not more than a dozen members in attendance, and immediately took a further recess until 11:40 A. M., at which hour the House was again called to order.

AMENDING THE ELECTORAL LAW.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, from the Committee on Rules, reported a bill amendatory of the act providing for the counting of the Electoral votes. It provides that when either house is engaged in legislative business it can order an adjournment until 10 o'clock on the following day. He explained that unless such a bill was passed great confusion would ensue.

Mr. WHITTHORNE, of Tennessee, thought if the House and Senate should adjourn it might further complicate the Presidential question, as the law provided that the Electoral votes should be counted on a certain day.

After discussion, the bill was recommitted to the Committee on Rules.

THE LEGISLATIVE APPROPRIATIONS.

The House then, at 12:35, went into Committee of the Whole on the Legislative Appropriation bill, Mr. REAGAN, of Texas, in the chair. The bill appropriates $14,266,155 50. The reading of the bill being dispensed with, the committee proceeded to its consideration by sections.

Mr. FOSTER, of Ohio, moved to amend by striking out of the first section the paragraph which fixes the compensation of Senators at $4,500. He said that the question had been settled last year in the Conference Committee, and he thought the House should stand up manfully for what it knew would be the action of the two houses.

The amendment was agreed to by a vote of 133 to 81, and Mr. Holman, of Indiana, gave notice that he would call for a separate vote in the House, to see if it would confirm the extraordinary vote of the committee; extraordinary, because the House, with almost unanimity, less than a year ago decided that $4,500 was a reasonable and sufficient compensation. It was an unseemly thing for the legislators of the people to insist on high salaries for themselves, and to reduce the compensation of the small-salaried officers of the Government.

Mr. WADDELL, of North Carolina, said that the services of members of Congress were worth $5,000 or they were not worth anything. He was tired and sick of this two-cent economy, and he never wanted again to hear on the floor of the House any attempt to cut down the salaries of the servants of the people. The fact that the gentleman from Indiana had not been returned to the next Congress showed how his constituents believed in the two-cent economy. He [Mr. Waddell] expressed his disgust at the attempt to cut down salaries, and said it was false economy.

Mr. FOSTER said that it was hardly the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Holman] that the Committee on Appropriations would bring itself into ridicule it it again brought up the question of cutting down salaries; that question had been settled finally last year.

Mr. HOLMAN thought that the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. Waddell] should not have pushed to the fact that he was indifferent to the taxation of his people. That was very well known already, for the gentleman had always been opposed to reform in the public service.

Mr. WADDELL—I said no such thing. The gentleman misrepresents me, and he knows it.

Mr. HOLMAN continuing, said that when the gentleman had represented his district half as long as he [Mr. Holman] had represented his, it would then be time to talk about two-cent economy. He had been prepared to see the opposition come from the Democratic side. If the House refused to stand by the honest effort—as he believed it—to reduce expenditures and thereby devote the salaries of its members, it could not consistently with its own manhood reduce the salaries of the other officers of the Government.

Mr. WADDELL said that the gentleman from Indiana had served long enough to fatigue the community, and he had been elected by a largely increased majority. The gentleman from Indiana had been pleased to say that he [Mr. Waddell] had expressed himself as opposed to reform, and he replied that the gentleman had misrepresented him, and that he knew it. He repeated that now, and had no apology to make for what he had said.

Mr. HOLMAN replied that the two-cent economy which was so derided had reduced the expenses of the Government $25,000,000, and that it had been the boast and pride of his side of the House that it had been through its endeavor that that had been done. It was to that economy that the Democratic party owed the majority in the next Congress, and yet it was from the Democratic side that the humiliating confession came that that economy had been a false pretext.

Mr. KELLEY, of Pennsylvania, charged that the [illegible] was the most expensive that the country had ever had. Its economy had been wasteful extravagance. It refused to make the necessary appropriations for public business, and was paying large rents for offices in the different cities. In Chicago the Government was paying $70,000 rent for offices, while a public building on which $4,000,000 had been expended was not completed for want of the necessary appropriation. It was the same in Philadelphia, where the Government was paying nearly $45,000 a year for offices, while a building on which $3,000,000 had been expended was left unfinished. The whole of this so-called economical legislation was a blow at labor and the productive industries of the country, for the loss on public buildings was at least 6 per cent, and 6 per cent. capital.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania, indorsed his colleague's assertion that the economy of the Democratic Party was a wasteful economy, and spoke of its effect in reducing the efficiency of the various departments in Washington.

Mr. KELLEY again got the floor, and said that in the last political campaign the Democrats had gone to the country on their professions of economy, but he thanked God that the American people had some intelligence. The Democratic majority in the present House was about two-thirds. In the next House it would be a questionable majority of three or four, and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Holman] would stand out in the cold [laughter.] The gentleman's own constituents had gone behind his rhetorical phrases on economy, and looked at the consummate extravagance to which he had urged the House, and they had voted accordingly.

Mr. HOLMAN, of Indiana, took the floor and commented upon Mr. Kelley's expression about his [Mr. Holman] being left out in the cold. That gentleman never represented a constituency which did not coincide with himself in political sentiment, while he [Holman] now represented the largest Republican district in Indiana.

Mr. KELLEY—I beg leave to say that I have represented such a constituency.

Mr. HOLMAN—The gentleman would be glad to let the whole people of the country suffer by taxation in order that vast sums of money may be spent in Philadelphia. He has managed to keep in Congress year by year by getting very handsome appropriations to be expended under his eye, and he will not expect to remain out in the cold so long as he has the public Treasury to go to for the benefit of his constituents.

Mr. KELLEY also desired to say a few words apologetically to the gentleman from Indiana. No one had a higher estimate than himself of the integrity and industry of the gentleman, but the objection to the gentleman was that he had so long contemplated dimes and threepences that in financial matters his vision had become microscopical, and so he had misled his party. He had not meant to reflect on the gentleman individually for having been left out in the cold. He had only meant to class him with all the "dead men" on the other side. In passing by that side of the House one felt as if passing through a morgue, and when the atmosphere was a little uncertain, one saw, as it were, the shadowy and shivering ghosts of dead members of Congress floating about. [Laughter.] He therefore hoped that the gentleman from Indiana would not apply his remarks as personal to himself, but to that unwise and inhuman economy which had come so near to extinguishing the majority. [Laughter.]

Finally the discussion closed, and subsequently, on Mr. FOSTER'S motion, the like amendment was made in the item for salaries of Members of the House.

After disposing of 12 out of the 75 pages of the bill, the committee rose, and the House, at 4:45 o'clock, took a recess until 10 o'clock to-morrow morning.

MUNICIPAL AFFAIRS.

STATEMENT MADE BY THE CONTROLLER TO THE SENATE SHOWING THE BONDED INDEBTEDNESS OF THE CITY.

Controller Kelly has sent to the State Senate a long communication showing the bonded indebtedness of the City up to Dec. 31, 1876; the securities then in the Sinking Fund for the redemption of the City debt; the details of the bonds and stocks issued in behalf of the City from 1841 until the close of last year; the statutes under which such bonds were issued, and also the estimated amount of claims pending against the City. The information was furnished in response to a resolution adopted by the Senate. In his communication the Controller says that the claims against the City, as near as could be conveniently ascertained, and according to a report of the Law Department, amounted to $10,000,000, but the data on which to base an estimate of the total amount was so uncertain that it could not be even approximately reported. A large number of claims were in litigation. The communication then gives the following statistics: Bonded debt of the City on Dec. 31, 1876, $168,707,537 79. Debt of the annexed district, for which the City is liable, $1,250,000. Securities held by the sinking fund for the redemption of the City debt, $28,179,102 79; unpaid assessments on real estate, $11,700,000; amount of advances on contracts and public improvements, now in progress and not completed (estimated at) $10,000,000. The amount of assessments which can be hereafter imposed for such advances will fall far below this amount. Reference is next made to works authorized by law, and which will require the following amounts to complete the contracts: Museum of Art, $109,997 66; Museum of Natural History, $9,263; constructing reservoir in Putnam County, $244,000; erection of the Third District Court-house, $28,582; completion of the new County Court-house, $376,478; materials for constructing docks and piers, $170,523. Schedules of the various stocks and bonds issued by the City and the legal authority for each are appended to the communication.

THE ATTACK ON COMMISSIONER CAMPBELL.

It was stated in the Department of Public Works yesterday that Commissioner Campbell would pay no attention to the resolution passed by the Democratic members of the Board of Aldermen, charging him with neglecting his official duties. The attack on Mr. Campbell is attributed to his refusal to give the complaining City Fathers any of his patronage.

THE AMERICAN BIBLE SOCIETY.

The stated meeting of the Board of Managers was held at the Bible House, Astor Place, on Thursday, Feb. 1, at 3:30 o'clock P. M., William H. Allen, LL.D., President, in the chair. Rev. William Adams, D. D., read from the sixth chapter of Ephesians and offered prayer. Correspondence from foreign lands was laid before the board, including letters from Dr. Trumbull and Rev. Mr. Merwin, of Valparaiso; Rev. J. K. Kilbourne, of Monterey; Rev. M. N. Hutchinson, of Mexico, with an account of the difficulties attending Bible distribution in the present disturbed state of the Republic; Rev. J. De Palmas, at Aspinwall, Dec. 26; Dr. McGirk, of Trinidad; Rev. E. Lane, of Campinas; Dr. Gulick, at Kobe, Dec. 20; Dr. I. G. Bliss, of Constantinople; Rev. T. P. Beebe, of Smyrna; Rev. Dr. W. G. Schauffler, of Brünn, Austria, reporting progress in the printing of the Turkish Pentateuch; Rev. J. V. N. Talmadge, of Amoy; Dr. Blodgett, of Peking, and Bishop Burden, respecting the Chinese names for Deity. The Librarian reported that about 4,000 volumes, chiefly of various editions and versions of the Scriptures, had been recently purchased at advantageous rates, at the Hastie-Tracy sale, for the library of the society. Among the books are copies of the first edition of King James' version, the first and second editions of the Rheims New Testament, the second edition of the Douay Bible, Paris standard edition of 1769, the Vinegar Bible, Forshall and Madden's edition of Wyckliffe, in four quarto volumes, and a Latin Bible of 1480. Various grants of books were made to auxiliary societies and individuals, chiefly for distribution in the United States, the total number of volumes being about 6,650, including six volumes in raised letters for the blind. The receipts for January were $43,487 66; copies of Scripture issued, 37,563 volumes.

NAUTICAL SCHOOL GRADUATES.

The appeals to ship-owners and ship-masters to employ the graduates of the New-York Nautical School-ship St. Mary's do not appear to have been disregarded, and there is every prospect that as fast as the school prepares boys to enter the merchant marine they will find employment. Several vessels now loading for foreign ports are supplied with numbers of the boys. The bark Iron Age—which was one of the first iron merchant vessels built—owned by Tupper & Beattie, has an entire crew of these boys, and it is believed that they will be competent to handle this craft of 700 tons burden. The Iron Age is bound for Rio, and the expectation is that the crew will make the round trip. Snow & Burgess have supplied several of their vessels with four boys each. The ships Samuel Watts, Spartan, Ventura, and Edward O'Brien, all bound on voyages around Cape Horn, will take a part of their complement, several of the young seamen. They have all accepted their berths without advance money and generally without stipulated wages, and their pay will be determined after they have shown by their behavior and the degree of usefulness they evince about what they deserve to receive. Nearly all of the boys who recently graduated have been engaged, and it is probable that the St. Mary's will soon be cleared of all the pupils of the school who are ready to engage in active service.

A DEBAUCH THAT ENDED IN SUICIDE.

An Englishman named George C. Chadwick died at his boarding-house, No. 129 King street, on Wednesday, from the effects of a dose of Paris green taken with suicidal intent. The case was reported to the Coroner's office as "a sudden death from natural causes," but Coroner Ellinger on making an investigation discovered evidence that the man had committed suicide. Chadwick lived during the last 10 years of his life in the boarding-house of John H. Schwartz, No. 129 King street, and was employed up to Jan. 1 on the dock of the State Line of steamers, at the foot of Canal street. Though of regular habits, he went on a spree on New Year's Day which lasted until his death. On Monday last he was found in a partially unconscious condition in the hallway of his boarding-house, and having been removed to his room, remained there until his death. Some Paris green was found scattered near his bedside some time after the discovery of the fact that he had died. Among his effects was found a brief note from his nephew, Thomas Chadwick, a soldier in the Broadway Foundry, Mount Zion [illegible], Rochdale, England.

LAW REPORTS.

THE COUNTERFEIT PACIFIC BONDS.

EXAMINATION IN THE CASE OF CYRUS G. CLARK—HE IS COMMITTED FOR TRIAL IN DEFAULT OF BAIL.

The examination in the case of Cyrus G. Clark, charged with altering 21 counterfeit $1,000 Central Pacific first mortgage bonds to the East River National Bank on Monday last, was called at the Tombs Police Court yesterday morning, before Justice Kilbreth. Mr. E. Ellery Anderson appeared for the bank, and Mr. John O. Mott for Clark. Mr. Charles Jenkins, the President of the bank, was cross-examined by Mr. Mott on his complaint, and testified as follows: I have known Clark about two years; he has done very little business with our bank; on Thursday of last week Clark told me that he wanted a loan on bonds to enable him to engage in the vulcanized timber business; I told him he might make an application, which he did, for $12,000 on 21 Central Pacific bonds, and I placed his application before the Board of Directors; he wanted $12,000 for six months, with the right to increase the amount if he liked, and it was decided to let him have the loan, with the privilege of increasing it to 95 per cent. of the par value of the bonds; on Monday he brought the bonds to the bank and opened an account as Treasurer of the Vulcanised Lumber Company, but the account was not entered on our books; I gave the bonds to Mr. Newell, the Cashier, to take to the office of Fisk & Hatch, and see if they were all right; after Newell had gone out, Clark gave me a check to pay for a balance due from him to the bank on a loan of $460 made to him about a year ago on Indianapolis and Bloomington bonds, and he said he wanted money, and I let him draw $950 in bank bills, for which he gave me his check, and then went out and soon returned bringing another Central Pacific bond, which he said he wanted kept safe with the Indianapolis and Bloomington bonds.

Mr. Zenas E. Newell, the Cashier of the bank, testified that Fisk & Hatch examined the bonds and did not like to pass upon them; Mr Hatch went with me to the Central Pacific office, where they were pronounced to be counterfeits.

The prisoner Clark was called by Mr. Mott, and testified as follows: I reside at the Grand Central Hotel; I found the bonds on the sidewalk in Ann street, near the entrance to the Bennett Building, in the afternoon of, I think, the 23 of January; I put them in my pocket and went into a back-room of McGroarty's saloon, No. 14 Ann street, and examined them, and afterward took them home; I looked in the papers the next day and found they were not advertised; I then went to the Central Pacific office and asked them whether they had any bonds that were not a good delivery, and was informed that they had not, unless they were mutilated ones; I showed one of the bonds and was told that it was all right; but it was merely glanced at; I watched some days for an advertisement for the bonds, and, not finding any, I advertised them myself on the 16th of January, but found no claimant for them.

To Mr. Ellery—I formerly lived in New-Haven, where I did business as a druggist; in 1874, I removed to New-York and engaged in the jewelry business, at Nos. 689 and 704 Broadway, and was subsequently engaged in soliciting advertisements for New-York newspapers; I am now under $5,000 bail under an indictment found against me in New-Jersey for receiving and attempting to negotiate Jersey City water loan bonds stolen by Hamilton, the defaulting Treasurer of Jersey City.

Justice Kilbreth decided to hold Clark for trial, and fixed the bail at $5,000, which Mr. Mott said would be furnished to-day, in the form of a certified check.

A FAMILY QUARREL.

AN EXCITING SCENE ON BROADWAY—TWO BROTHERS HELD ON A CHARGE OF FELONIOUS ASSAULT.

Litigation has been pending for a number of years in relation to the settlement of the estate of Nathaniel Gilman, who died leaving property valued at several hundred thousand dollars. George F., his eldest son, a child by his first wife, was appointed one of his Executors. Three children by his second wife, Charles B., Frazier, and Theophilus, aged respectively, 45, 29, and 27 years, have shown bitter feeling toward their elder half-brother, on the ground that he has the largest share of the estate, and has not treated them fairly. The counsel for George F. is the firm of Fullerton, Knox & Crosby, and Mr. Charles E. Whitehead is counsel for Charles, Frazier, and Theophilus. Yesterday afternoon, about 3 o'clock, as George F. was leaving his counsel's office in the Equitable Building, an altercation ensued, just as he was about to drive off in his carriage, between his three half-brothers, who had been awaiting his exit from the building, and Thomas Halloran, the coachman, resulting in blows, the drawing of pistols, and the subsequent appearance of all the parties at the Tombs Police Court, before Justice Kilbreth, to make counter charges against each other. Charles B., who had received a severe blow on the head from the butt-end of the coachman's whip, made a charge of assault and battery against the coachman and Geo. F., alleging that the latter had ordered the coachman to strike him. The coachman made charges of felonious assault and battery against Charles B., Frazier, and Theophilus, alleging that the first two had presented loaded pistols at and threatened to shoot him, and that Theophilus had urged them to shoot.

Justice Kilbreth dismissed the charges against the coachman, and Theophilus, and required Charles B. and Frazier to give bail in $1,500 each to answer a charge of felonious assault and battery, and he accepted their counsel, Mr. Whitehead, as temporary surety until to-day. George F. Gilman is interested in the Great American, Atlantic and Pacific, and other tea companies, and resides at the Windsor Hotel. Charles B., Frazier, and Theophilus reside at No. 965 Clinton street, Brooklyn.

AN ORDER OF ARREST AGAINST MR. CLEWS.

Judge Speir, in the Special Term of the Superior Court, yesterday issued an order of arrest against Henry Clews in a suit brought by Henry Hesnequin & Co., of Paris. The present action is somewhat similar in its averments to a suit brought some time ago by the Parisian firm, though this latter suit was really against the firm of Frederick Butterfield & Co. The plaintiffs state that in October, 1871, Henry Clews & Co. opened a credit for their benefit with Clews, Habicht & Co., of London, for £6,000 sterling. Messrs. Hennequin & Co. drew bills of exchange on the house of Clews, Habicht & Co., it being understood and agreed that Hennequin & Co. were to send money to the latter to meet the bills when they matured. The Paris firm deposited with Henry Clews & Co. 29 first mortgage bonds of the Toledo and Wabash Railroad Company as security, in case they Hennequin & Co. should fail to remit to Clews, Habicht & Co. sufficient money to meet their bills of exchange drawn on the latter. In September, 1873, the complaint alleges, Clews, Habicht & Co. and Henry Clews & Co. suspended payments. Hennequin & Co. then paid all the bills of exchange outstanding which they had drawn on Clews, Habicht & Co., and demanded from Henry Clews & Co. the return of the 29 bonds. Henry Clews & Co. refused to give them up. Hennequin & Co. allege that Henry Clews & Co. fraudulently hypothecated the bonds to Frederick Butterfield & Co., with other securities, as collateral for about $300,000 of loans. The Paris firm therefore sues to recover over $30,000 for the alleged wrongful conversion of the bonds. On the complaint in the case and an affidavit setting forth these allegations, C. Bainbridge Smith, the counsel for Hennequin & Co., yesterday obtained the order of arrest against Henry Clews, and the latter was held in $130,000 bail.

JOHN F. CHAMBERLIN'S BANKRUPTCY.

John F. Chamberlin, the sporting man, whose gambling establishment is one of the most frequented places in Long Branch, was sued some time since by the late A. T. Stewart, who sought to hold Chamberlin responsible as surety for Charles Thorne, Sr., in a lease of Niolo's Garden. A judgment was obtained against Chamberlin for $27,393 99 in the Court of Common Pleas. The execution which was issued was returned unsatisfied, and Messrs. Townsend & Weed, the attorneys for the Stewart estate, obtained an order for the examination of Chamberlin on supplementary proceedings. One day's session of such examination was had, and then successive adjournments were procured. Another session was to have been had yesterday morning, but a minute before the appointed time Messrs. Townsend & Weed were served with an injunction issued by Judge Blatchford, of the United States District Court, restraining all further examination on the supplementary proceedings. The order of injunction recited that E. C. Chamberlin had filed a petition in bankruptcy, and that the claim of the Stewart estate was one which could properly be presented in the bankruptcy proceedings. The further examination in the supplementary proceedings was therefore postponed for the present. The schedule of indebtedness filed by Mr. Chamberlin in the bankruptcy proceeding is rather curious in many respects, and seems to show that he must have possessed, in an unusual degree, the confidence of many kinds of persons. His debts foot up over $215,000, while his nominal assets, which are mostly sporting stocks, amount to only $17,106. The actual value of the assets does not appear. Among Mr. Chamberlin's largest creditors are Jay Gould, to whom he owes $14,104 46; Charles Knap, Washington, to whom he owes $51,829, and the estate of A. T. Stewart & Co., to which he owes $27,393 99. Mr. Chamberlin also says he owes to one "William H. Chamberlin, Bridgeport, gambler, $25,000, and to Henry P. McGrath, also described as a "gambler," $5,000. To Channing B. Botford Mr. Chamberlin is indebted to the amount of $3,500; to the Attorney General for the amount of a forfeited bail bond in the case of Henry Cook, one of the "Ring" fugitives, $10,000; to Morgan Jones, $8,000, and to Lawrence W. Jerome, $5,788 98. Among other debts are nearly $10,000 to wine dealers, $8,000 to lawyers, $3,100 to tailors, over $500 to shirt-makers, $2,000 to grocers, over $2,000 to butchers, and quite respectable amounts to dry goods dealers and others.

COURT NOTES.

Judge Donohue yesterday denied the motion to compel Anthony Miller, the Receiver of the German Press Society, to pay $600 to the compositors of the New-Yorker Presse.

Prof. W. P. Blake yesterday continued his testimony in the Emma Mine suit before Judge Wallace, in the United States Circuit Court. Further hearing of the case was adjourned until Thursday next.

The Grand Jury concluded their labors yesterday, after a long session of five weeks, during which they disposed of 456 cases. Judge Gildersleeve, on dismissing them, complimented them for the satisfactory manner in which they had discharged their duties.

Felix Purcell, the leader of a gang of youthful desperadoes, who several weeks ago made a combined assault on Officer Mackinson, of the Thirteenth Precinct, was arraigned in the Essex Market Police Court yesterday, before Justice Wandell, who committed him in default of $500 bail.

William Walter Thompson, a youth, who stole a value containing clothing valued at $115, the property of Alfred F. Edwards, a passenger on the Pacific Mail steamship Mexico, was committed by Assistant District Attorney Rollins, in the Court of General Sessions, yesterday, and sent to State Prison for three years.

Application was made before Judge Speir, in the Supreme Court, Special Term, yesterday, for the vacating of an order of arrest against the defendant in the suit of Charles Westerman against Thomas P. Remington, Jr. The facts of the case have been given heretofore in extenso in THE TIMES. Decision was reserved.

United States Commissioner Betts yesterday began an examination in the case of Messrs. Bamberger & Gans, who are charged with having concealed a large portion of their assets, with the design of defrauding their creditors. There was no important testimony elicited, however, and the further hearing of the case was adjourned until Monday next.

George Davis, alias Stephen Williams, and Ellen Smith, who were convicted by Assistant District Attorney Rollins of receiving over $600 worth of spool silk, the property of Belding Brothers & Co., stolen from the office of the New-York and New-England Express Company, were brought before Judge Gildersleeve yesterday, and sentenced to five years each in State Prison.

Judge Donohue, in Supreme Court, Chambers, yesterday, dismissed a writ of habeas corpus in the matter of Julius Kelter, who was held in $2,500 to appear and testify as a witness against the alleged forgers of a $1,000 check on the Union Trust Company. A writ of habeas corpus returnable to-day was granted by Judge Donohue in the case of Julius M. Columbani, who is accused of having been concerned in the forgery.

James L. Manker, the man who attempted to pass a "raised" $2 bill recently in Brooklyn, was yesterday sentenced by Judge Benedict, in the United States Circuit Court, to one year and six months in the Penitentiary. A like sentence was also pronounced upon Alfred Mangot, who was arrested recently on a charge of counterfeiting 10-cent pieces, and on whose premises were found at the time of the arrest plaster of Paris dies for counterfeiting coin.

The case of Leonard Langbein against George D. Rollwagen was brought before Judge Joseph F. Daly, in the Special Term of the Court of Common Pleas, yesterday, on a motion for a reference made by George F. Laugbein, the plaintiff's counsel. The suit is brought to recover $445 fees for legal services. The answer denies the indebtedness. Judge Daly took the papers, intimating, however, that he would grant the motion for a reference.

Before Judge Donohue, in Supreme Court, Chambers, yesterday, the release from imprisonment of Robert Siebert was sought by writ of habeas corpus. Siebert was arrested on the 30th ult., and committed in default of $1,000 bail on the charge of stealing, by trick and device, three sewing-machines from one Charles Kohler. Siebert admitted having disposed of the machines on the very day he obtained them. Judge Donohue dismissed the writ of habeas corpus and remanded the prisoner.

The trial of the suit of Michael Keefe against the Williamsburg City Fire Insurance Company was resumed yesterday, in the Supreme Court Circuit, before Justice Pratt, when Mr. George A. Gilbert, adjuster of fire losses, testified that on the day following the fire he went to Mr. Keefe's store in company with the Surveyor of the defendants, and there made an inventory of the goods, with their approximate value. The cost value was estimated at $2,168 83. The case is not yet concluded.

Mary E. Leichtweis has brought a suit against Thomas Treskow in the Supreme Court to recover damages for his alleged breach of promise accompanied by seduction. On the 25th ult. she had Treskow arrested, and he petitioned for his release to Judge Donohue, in Supreme Court, Chambers, yesterday. Treskow says in defense that the charge is made for the purpose of extorting money, and that he has not seen the plaintiff for the past 13 months, at the beginning of which period the alleged seduction is said to have occurred. An order to show cause why the order of arrest should not be vacated was granted.

A LEGAL AS WELL AS A MORAL DUTY.

Judge Van Vorst, in the Supreme Court, Special Term, yesterday rendered a decision in the case of Christian F. A. Dambmann against Herman Schulting. The defendant, it appears, was a prominent merchant of this City, but became embarrassed financially in the Winter of 1866. A number of his creditors, including Dambmann & Co., of whom the plaintiff is the surviving partner, made loans to Schulting to get him out or his difficulties. Dambmann & Co. loaned Schulting $10,000. The following agreement was executed by the parties in regard to the loan:

"We, the undersigned, agree, in consideration of $1 paid to us, to discharge H. Schulting from a legal payment of the money loaned to him on Feb. 17, 1866. Schulting giving his moral obligation to refund the said money, in whole or in part, as his means will allow in the future."

Schulting forward sold his stock of goods for $225,000 of Stursburg & Co. In addition to this he was to have one-third of any excess over the $225,000 which would result from a resale of the goods. The stock was sold by Stursburg for $576,000, and Schulting's one-third therefore amounted to over $100,000. In August, 1868, Schulting had a conversation with Dambmann and told the latter the one-third would amount to little or nothing. Two months later Schulting paid Dambmann $5,000 of the $10,000 loaned, and Dambmann executed a release in full to Schulting for the claim. Dambmann brought the present suit to recover the $5,000 remaining, claiming that the release was procured by false and fraudulent representations and concealment of facts by Schulting. The latter in defense claimed that the memorandum of agreement above given, though imposing a moral duty, was not enforcible in the courts, and even if this were not so the plaintiff was estopped by the release in full from setting up his claim. Judge Van Vorst holds that the agreement did not discharge Schulting and substitute for the latter's legal liability a mere moral duty not to be enforced by action, but that there is a legal claim existing in the event of Schulting's acquiring means, and that this claim can be enforced. The release in full is void because of Schulting's concealment of facts of which Dambmann should have been informed. Judgment is given, therefore, for the plaintiff.

THE DIAMOND ROBBERY CASE.

In the case in which William F. C. McCarty is charged with stealing $10,000 worth of diamond jewelry from Charles V. Hand, the latter swore during the examination that he went with McCarty on last Saturday morning to Judge Sutherland's office, in the Bennett Building, and waited outside the office while McCarthy went in with the jewelry, to see, as he said, a person who would make a loan on it, and that McCarty came out almost immediately and said that the party was not there. Two gentlemen from Judge Sutherland's office came to the Tombs yesterday, and identified McCarty as the man who called at the office on Saturday, and said that he merely inquired for Judge Sutherland, who was out of town. Mr. John O. Mott, Hand's counsel, said yesterday that he and Hand visited Simpson's pawn shop, in the Bowery, on Wednesday, and found there a diamond ring worth $300, which was one of the pieces of the stolen jewelry, and was pawned by McCann alias Thompson, for $100.

A FORGER SENTENCED.

On the 11th December a purchaser called at the furniture store of George C. Flint, Nos. 104 and 106 West Fourteenth street, and ordered $600 worth of furniture, giving in payment therefor a check for $750 on the National Bank of Newburg, payable to James H. Potter, and purporting to be signed by D. L. More & Co., and certified to by G. Williams, an attaché of the bank. Potter represented that he was the person to whom the check had been made payable, and having duly indorsed it, received $150 change. Mr. Flint subsequently discovered that the check was a forgery, no such firm as D. L. More & Co. having an account at the Newburg bank. The forger was arrested under the alias of Lilly, and on being called up for trial by Assistant District Attorney Rollins, in General Sessions, yesterday, pleaded guilty. Judge Gildersleeve sentenced him to two years and six months in State Prison.

A SUIT FOR BREACH OF PROMISE.

Lucy Wood, a damsel of some eighteen Summers, was in the employ of one James Turner as housekeeper about one year ago. While acting in this capacity she claims he accomplished her ruin under promise of marriage. She made affidavit to these statements, and her counsel, Watson W. Moore, applied to Judge Joseph F. Daly, in the Special Term of the Court of Common Pleas, yesterday, to have a guardian appointed for Miss Wood in the suit. Judge Daly appointed John Wood as such guardian, and he will, according to the papers, bring a suit to recover $5,000 damages for the alleged wrong done to Miss Wood and for the support of her child.

The case for Tilden was opened yesterday by David Dudley Field, the advocate and adviser of Fisk and Gould, the friend of Barnard and Cardozo, and the counsel of Tweed. If it were possible for the Democratic case to suffer further discredit, the prominence of such a defender should be enough to condemn it. Mr. Tilden claims credit for his share in the impeachment of the corrupt Judges and in the exposure of the frauds of the Ring, yet he has retained as his chief agent the man whose name is indissolubly connected with both. If Charles O'Conor retains any of his old scorn for professional schemers and pettifoggers, he must feel heartily ashamed of the company in which he finds himself, though it may be too much to expect any display of fastidiousness from the author of the brutal libel on President Grant. If only Ben Butler had been retained by Tilden, the array of legal talent on the Democratic side would have been thoroughly representative of the methods and morals of the party.

Mr. Field gave several remarkable specimens of legal argument in his opening speech. While admitting that no law had been provided for trying the title of the President of the United States by a writ of quo warranto, he held that such a proceeding "is within the purview of the Constitution," and that, therefore, the Electoral Commission has received from Congress the right to investigate the Presidential title in a way that Congress failed to provide for, and which, if it had legalized, would only be admissible before the Supreme Court. Mr. Field would, in fact, have the new tribunal not only assume the existence of legislative enactments which were never passed, but also the possession of judicial powers which were never conferred. By a somewhat similar process of reasoning, while he is forced to admit that the judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction cannot be impeached collaterally for fraud, he maintains that, nevertheless, the decisions of State Boards acting in a judicial capacity may be regarded as "documents" which may be so impeached. There is but one thing in Mr. Field's speech more remarkable than its logic, and that is its rhetoric, which is a poor imitation of Mr. Conkling at his worst.

The latest batch of Oregon telegrams helps to fill up some of the blanks in the history of the Tilden-Grover conspiracy. It was on Nov. 19 that Tilden's man Pelton asked George L. Miller, the Democratic agent at Omaha, to go to Oregon in order to "fix" things for stealing that odd vote for the "Reform" candidate. Miller replied on the same day that he would send "a better man"—the notorious Patrick—and now we have his telegram of the 25th to Gov. Grover, announcing the early arrival of this person. Then comes, on Dec. 6, a wild "yawp" from the belligerent John M. Corse, of Chicago, who has 100,000 men ready to "back up" that stolen vote; and on the same day a mysterious dispatch in the thieves' argot used by the conspirators, but which clearly indicates the kind of "arguments" which had prevailed in Oregon, and the "motives to fidelity" which kept one member of the gang from betraying the other. It is obvious that had the versatile Pickett chosen Oregon as the scene of his labors, he would have found his "pigs" much readier for the market than in Louisiana.

Pickett's associate, Maddox, gave some further samples of his ingenuity and his impudence before the House Committee yesterday. Like Pickett, he claims to have acted "on broad moral grounds," and he thought, with those eminent statesmen, Morrissey and Hewitt, that it was better for the people to buy their rights than to lose them. Gen. Anderson, of the Louisiana Returning Board, emphatically denied the statements of Maddox in regard to having met him in Gov. Wells' room, and stated that he heard in the committee room for the first time of the marvelous plot unfolded by that precious pair of rascals, Maddox and Pickett. Gen. Anderson had, however, been offered $200,000 by Dr. Robertson, a Democratic State Senator, if he would insure the State for the Democrats, but promptly convinced that person that his importunities were thrown away. The Democrats will, of course, dispose of this testimony by declaring that the members of the Returning Board would not stop at perjury if it suited their purpose. But what of Pickett and Maddox, beside whom Gov. Wells and his colleagues are honorable and high-minded gentlemen? Would any unprejudiced jury believe these scamps on oath or otherwise?

There was a little family quarrel on the floor of the House yesterday, in which that typical demagogue, Mr. Holman, of Indiana, received some rather rough handling from one or two of his party associates. The squabble occurred over a proposal to cut down the pay of members of Congress from $5,000 to $4,500. This was characterized by Mr. Waddell, of North Carolina, as a sample of Holman's "two-cent economy," of which he (Waddell) was "tired and sick," and of which he inferred from the result of the late election that the country was tired and sick also. Mr. Holman received several unkind cuts about having wearied his constituents and being banished to that political Hades which the poetic eye of Mr. Kelley sees peopled with "the sheeted and shivering ghosts of dead Congressmen." Altogether, the debate rendered it sufficiently obvious that retrenchment as an article of what the Democrats are pleased to call their policy is "played out." Like the repudiation of rebel claims and the avoidance of Southern subsidies, it was a good enough pretext till after the election.

It is reported that the Texas Pacific Railroad lobby is by no means discouraged at the delay of that job. There are twenty-five working days left of this session of Congress, and the counting of the Electoral vote overshadows all legislation. What is to be done for the Texas Pacific scheme must be done with a rush. Accordingly the lobby is preparing to spring the measure in the House when the bustle and confusion of the last days of the session make this easier than it is now. The reliance of the friends of honest and economical legislation is on the vigilance of members opposed to the bill. It appears almost incredible that anybody should persist in forcing this job now; but the fact that such a movement seems so unlikely is one of the dangerous elements of the case.

PARTY REORGANIZATION.

It would be unfair to hold the President responsible for opinions imputed to him in Democratic quarters in regard to the future of parties, and the tendency of political events in the Southern States. The object of Democratic news-gatherers in representing him as signalizing the close of his Presidential career by impugning the status of the party whose heaviest burdens have grown out of the mistakes of his Administration, is too obvious to be mistaken. Just as it has suited Democratic journals to coquet with the New-York Senator whom, for years, they have alternately ridiculed and abused, so it suits them to find pearls of wisdom in the utterances of a President they have persistently maligned. There is nothing surprising in Mr. Conkling's responses to the overtures of his life-long enemies. The transaction is sufficiently transparent to leave no room for wonder or doubt. The President is somewhat differently situated. He has no grudge to gratify, no slight to avenge. The Republican Party has honored him as it has honored few other men. It has stood by him when slandered and misrepresented; it has sustained him, often at infinite cost to itself; and it is not willing to believe that he intrusts his confidences to Democratic ears, and discusses with its enemies improbable contingencies of its existence. Mr. Hewitt was not credited when he professed to expound the President's ideas as to the Southern vote and its bearing on the Presidency; and the same skepticism prevails now when Mr. Hewitt's newspaper friends put into the President's mouth ideas respecting parties which presuppose reverses and changes that would be fatal to the Republican organization. Gen. Grant has not attained perfection in statesmanship, but at least he knows how to distinguish between supporters and assailants. He may not be wholly pleased with the direction events have taken, but only his slanderers will venture to allege that his present Southern policy is governed by a deliberate determination to break down the Republican Party in States where it still struggles for existence.

On their own merits, the "views on the dissolution and rehabilitation of the old parties," which the World, for its own purposes, attributes to the President, are not entitled to special consideration. He must, indeed, be a superficial observer who imagines that the accession of a Democratic President would be followed by the disintegration of the Democratic Party in the Southern States. Long continuance in office may beget dissensions, but for some time to come the Democrats would have enough work on hand to absorb their energies and prevent disputes about trifles. The consolidation of their power would keep them united. What has been done in the interest of humanity and justice they would undo. The conditions which have made Republican success possible would be destroyed. Things would be so reconstituted as to insure Democratic supremacy. Recent experience has shown the folly of relying upon a moderate element as a check to this tendency. The Democracy which dominates at the South is of the most pronounced type. Its objects are aggressive, its means unscrupulous. The "color line" may mark the boundaries of the party, but it can never be a menace to the party itself. And until the cherished purposes of the party are achieved, it has nothing to apprehend from State questions. The issues involved in the re-establishment of supremacy in local affairs are too vital to be subordinated to jealousies. Democratic unity is as absolute in South Carolina or Louisiana as in Georgia or Alabama, and the operating causes are the same in all cases. The time will come, of course, when changes must occur. The conflicts of ambition, the jarring interests of different localities, will in due season bring forth fruit. But the contingency is not worth considering now. The "views" which are valuable are those which relate to the probabilities of the present, not the possibilities of the remote future. As for the supposition that the emigration of Northern men with capital and enterprise will exercise any appreciable influence on Southern politics, we must characterize it as a delusion which the testimony of Northern settlers in the South rudely overturns. A solid Democratic South will offer no temptation to white Republicans.

As the party of progress and reform, the Republican Party is exposed to more potent causes of change. Itself a product of change in the composition of older organizations, it recognizes the necessity of studying closely the direction of events, the development of principles, and the adaptation of its policy to both. There might be some reason for speculating upon its dissolution if there were within its ranks a fierce conflict of convictions as to the course to be pursued. No such conflict exists. There is no fundamental difference among its members in reference either to abstract principles or practical ideas of duty. The contest at Cincinnati revealed the relative worth, and also the relative strength, of the two forces at work within the party; and the result possessed a significance much wider than any that could be involved in mere choice between candidates. The vitality of the party asserted itself, and the "rings" were broken. The good elements gained the mastery over the bad. And in thus emancipating itself from influences that had impaired its usefulness, and from pretensions that were irreconcilable with enduring prosperity, it demonstrated the inherent power of principle in its organization. A party thus faithful to its pledges, and thus equal to the emergencies which in all large bodies necessarily arise, cannot be truthfully spoken of as at the mercy of an accident in the settlement of an election. Having outlived disciplined and really dangerous hostility, it is not likely to succumb to covert assaults from some of its disappointed members. We may perhaps witness strange mutations in the party relationships of individuals, but the foundations of the Republican organization will remain unshaken.

THE VOICE OF A STATE.

How does a State speak? Through what agencies does it act? In what way does it give expression to its wishes and make known its will? These are questions which the people, as well as the Electoral Commission, are proceeding to solve.

The Constitution of a State is the deliberate, authentic will of that State. The laws of a State are the voice of such State, made known through the way ordained for that voice to find expression. The Legislature of a State is the law-making agency which formulates into statutes the State's wishes and desires. The Canvassing Officers and Returning Boards of States are the agents through whom the State acts and who utter its voice. Within the province of their duties they are the State. The State has itself commissioned these Returning Officers and clothed them with full and complete powers to do a particular thing for and in behalf of the State. Acting under the authority of the power which created them, they are solely responsible to the State for the faithful performance of their State duties. They are not accountable to or punishable by a neighboring State, or by all the adjacent States, or by all the States of the Union united into a Federal Government. They stand in the same relation to the United States as other State officers. They are responsible to the General Government or to bodies like the House of Representatives, that had nothing to do with their appointment, to the same extent and degree that State Treasurers, Auditors, and Probate Judges are responsible. A State cannot be brought before the bar of the House of Representatives to answer for contempt. If it can, then "State sovereignty" is as meaningless as county sovereignty, township sovereignty, or the sovereignty of a tow shirt.

The State also speaks or gives expression to its voice on one most important question, through Electors appointed by itself by express command of the national Constitution. These Electors, for the time being, are the State, acting for it, and it only, while discharging exclusively State functions, and ceasing to exist as Electors on the day those functions are performed. Statesmen of the Revolution have told us that each Electoral College has the same right to judge of the qualifications of its members as Congress has to judge of the qualifications of members of Congress. If this authority does not belong to the Electoral College, it clearly belongs to the State which appoints or creates these State bodies.

It is no answer to this argument of the founders of the Government to say that a State may appoint an ineligible Elector. It may abuse any power, great or small, which has been plainly and distinctly granted. The General Government may do the same. Congress may override the plain provisions of the Constitution, and it is remotely possible that the Supreme Court, though not cut asunder or in twain, might in some cases justify Congressional usurpation. This does not prove that Congress or the court should be stripped of all power. The President of the United States might appoint a circus clown Minister to England, or a negro minstrel Chief Justice, but this is no sufficient reason for depriving him of the appointing power.

The Governor of a State gives expression, in whole or in part, to the voice of a State, according as his control is exclusive or partial over the subject of his executive action. In the grave matter of the appointment of State Electors for President and Vice President, the State acts and, speaks through its laws, its Canvassing or Returning Officers, and its Electors, and hence only when the voice uttered is concurrent and harmonious must it be taken as true and authentic. The declaration of a State Executive, uncontradicted by that of other officers who co-operated with him in making known the will of a State in any matter in which there is joint action, is authentic and conclusive. But in no sense is an executive declaration the voice of a State in cases where the correctness of that statement is squarely contradicted by the official evidence of Canvassing Officers, official records, State Electors, and State laws. Then, and then only, is it proper for the Vice President or the authorized Federal authority to inquire what the voice of the State is. When that voice is clear and unequivocal, it should be respected, because the State has spoken in the manner in which it was authorized to speak by the Constitution.

MR. CONKLING'S STYLE.

Mr. Conkling, as we have recently learned from the concurrent testimony of a large number of Democrats, made a "great speech" when the Compromise bill was before the Senate. It was so "great" that one of his most ardent admirers in the Democratic press was moved to call attention to it as the "greatest" speech of that long debate, and to overwhelm those Republicans who have not always worshiped Mr. Conkling by pointing to that fact. Judged by the time taken in speaking, no one can deny the greatness of the effort. At the end of the first day, Mr. Edmunds, who had, if we may be allowed to say so, acted as bottle-holder to Mr. Conkling, helping him with a great many pointed and well-aimed phrases, which are the bright spots in this expanse of oratory, suggested to the Senate that his friend was completely exhausted, and asked for an adjournment. The second day, Mr. Conkling did not recover from his exhaustion in time to be present at the opening of the Senate. Obviously, from its effect on the speaker, the oration was a remarkable one.

We have read the speech carefully, and we have found nothing in it so great as its style. This is, indeed, characteristic, and therefore necessarily lofty. In the opening paragraphs of the speech is a passage which will show Mr. Conkling's idea of the proper dress for his thoughts. He quotes the language of the twelfth article of the Constitution as it was originally adopted by the convention, and he wishes to say that it was referred to the Committee on Style, not that the meaning might be changed, but that it might be made as clear as possible. This is the way the Senator goes about it:

"At length the provision was referred to the Committee on Style, and I beg to inquire for what purpose? To change the meaning of those who by little accretions of concurrence had built up step by step, with patience and care, a great fabric of government, destined, as they believed, to stand so strong and last so long? Was the purpose of the Committee on Style and of those who trusted the committee to take liberties with substance and to change the essence as it had been agreed to? O, no; but to define the meaning more sharply, to project it more distinctly and unmistakably before the minds of those who in a far future would appeal to this instrument as the testament and revelation of free institutions."

The Senator's begging to inquire is very like him. He is never so high and mighty as in his intense humility, because his humility is always assumed. This is shown in the apologetic tone with which he makes his most arrogant remarks to his fellow-Senators. His air is often that of genteel bullying; and we may add that no one has more often than Senator Edmunds ridiculed this habit of Mr. Conkling, or raised a laugh at his expense.

But to return to Mr. Conkling's style. It is, as we have remarked, always what the text-books would call "elevated." If he wishes to ask whether a dead man can be elected President, he says: "Was it designed that votes cast for one dead should be counted, and that he should fill with an aching void the office of President of the United States? Would that be 'agreeable' to the Constitution?" The Senator's conception of vigor is nicely displayed in supposing that if a void would not be agreeable to the Constitution, an "aching void" would be specially disagreeable.

Mr. Conkling is not content with expressing the grandeur of his own mind; he desires to impress it upon what others have to say. For instance, the minority of a House committee reported that Colorado was not a State. That does not satisfy Mr. Conkling, who makes them declare that "Colorado is inchoate, inconsummate as a member of the Union, her Statehood being in the chrysalis." This is, of course, much finer. The figures of speech in this "great" effort are among the most remarkable things about it. Mr. Conkling refers to the Supreme Court Justices as "holding their commissions for life, and as independent of parties and factions as is the monarch of the skies." Who or what is the monarch of the skies thus independent of parties and factions we do not know, nor, probably, does Mr. Conkling. Again, Mr. Conkling refers to the Republic as "the only considerable experiment of free government extant on the globe—an experiment which, should it fail, would turn the clock of ages far back on the dial." It would be pleasant to know by what process a clock, even a clock of ages, can be turned back upon the dial, or by what reasoning Mr. Conkling has discovered that England and France are not entitled to be ranked even as "considerable experiments" in free government.

Mr. Morton, in one of his speeches, had said in substance that the President of the Senate must decide in case of double returns, "ex necessitate rei," because no one else was authorized to do so. The contemplation of this very simple statement causes Mr. Conkling to break out in the following manner, "Necessity: that arch-fiend and foe of government, that prolific mother and apology for anarchy, revolution, despotism, and fraud, ever since the human government began. The pretensions of necessity have age after age affrighted humanity, trampled on right, gendered wars, and swept realms and rulers,

"Through caverns measureless to man,
Down to a sunless sea."

Not satisfied with this whirlwind of metaphor, Mr. Conkling turns on the unfortunate President of the Senate, and cries out, "This bastard child of destiny, born in the throes of an exigency specially arranged by the refusal of Congress to legislate, rising above the Constitution, is to decide, and when he has decided, from the rising of the sun even to the going down of the same, there shall not be one man who does not bow meekly and reverently to his decision." But the following is, perhaps, the most successful of Mr. Conkling's sentences. He is trying to say that the Government cannot go on if its officers will not act: "Whenever representatives, and States, and people, forsake the Government and leave it to languish and die, it will go down, as other Governments have gone, to the sepulchre of blasted nationalities and buried epochs." These are a few of the gems of Mr. Conkling's style. They are frankly acknowledged as his own.

But he sometimes has a trick of putting his finest phrases into the mouth of some one else, as if he were too modest to father them all himself. In speaking of a recommendation of the Constitutional Convention to Congress before the instrument was ratified, he remarks, as if he were giving dignity to his proposition: "Geologists would say it was prehistoric." Obviously, geologists, who are compelled to say what they mean in order to get a hearing, would say nothing of the kind. Again, wishing to state that the Constitution might be set going by a suggestion from the convention, he says: "It might be, as the French would say, by an impulsion." Impulsion is a practically obsolete synonym for impulse, of French derivation, but a Frenchman would not translate his own word by it, nor would he be guilty of the vulgarity of using the French word when the plain every-day English would be in every way better. In conclusion, we may remark that Mr. Conkling's oratorical style is not adapted to debate, but that is of little consequence, for Mr. Conkling rarely tries it in debate, and never really debates when he employs it. It is, in short, a style more for show than use.

THE COURSE OF FOREIGN TRADE.

The returns of the Bureau of Statistics show that the imports of merchandise for December were $32,369,460, against $31,324,755, and $36,852,000 for the corresponding month in 1875 and 1874 respectively, being an increase of $1,034,705 over December, 1875, which month itself showed a decline of $5,527,245 as compared with the corresponding time in 1874. With the exception of January, December was the only month in last year which failed to show a decline as compared with 1875, and the fact, as far as a single month is significant, indicates that the downward movement in imports since 1872 is, perhaps, now arrested. In part balancing an extraordinarily large export trade for the month, the imports of specie are large for December, being $11,884,286, against $1,428,808 in 1875. The following is the import movement, gold values, for the two calendar years:

1869	438,535,994	24,888,427	463,424,421

The following shows the changes in each of the three columns annually since 1869, comparing each year with the next previous one, the changes not designated with an asterisk being decline:

	Merchandise.	Specie.	Total.
1871	*112.020,796	8,800,955	*103,219,841
1870	*22,554.309	*716,943	*23,271,252

Turning now to exports, the comparison is as follows for the last two calendar years, gold values:

	1876.	1875.	Changes.
For. mdse.	14.923.743	13,683.685	*1,240,058

The following tables, using gold values only, show the export movement during the past eight years, and the changes in each of the three columns annually since 1869, comparing each year with the next previous one, the changes not designated being increase:

1875	*58,925,676	8,576.439	*50,349,237
1870	66,542,164	24,161,734	90,706,898

Again, comparing the imports with the exports during the eight years—in one case with specie included in both, and in the other with specie deducted from both—we have the following result, the figures being the excess of one quantity over the other:

	—Specie Included.— Imports.	Exports.	—Specie Excluded.— Imports.	Exports.
1874		63,190,035		7,716,764
1873	$29,545,047		$55,608,696
1872	118.875,561		194,813,195
1871	52,122,956		112,759,011
1870	2,256,776		57,602,131
1869	69,692,422		101,589,936

The net specie movement during the eight years is an export of $390,756,171, which, being less than the production of the precious metals, should apparently leave some increase of the stock remaining in the country. The net excess of exports for the period is $48,046,324, due entirely to the past year; in the total of the exports, the month of December was the climax, the domestic produce being $76,569,688, currency, (the largest ever recorded in a month,) against $64,114,991 for the same month in 1875, $61,226,000 in 1874, and $69,457,000 in 1873. As shown in the table immediately preceding, the foreign trade exactly reversed its movement in 1873, an excess of imports becoming then an excess of exports and maintaining that position since. Comparing 1876 with 1872, that year having the heaviest imports recorded, we find a decline of $187,784,728 in merchandise imports and of $172,930,110 in total imports; comparing 1876 with 1872, we find an increase of $171,037,544 in goods exports, and of $131,829,596 in exports including specie. An excess of $118,875,561 total imports over exports in 1872 is turned in 1876 into an excess of $185,884,145 of exports over imports. Comparing 1876 with 1875, there is an excess of total imports of $185,884,145, against $64,464,806 in 1875; or, taking goods traffic alone, the past year shows an export excess of $164,009,077, against one of $7,937,241, of this latter change $79,674,361 being rise in exports and $76,397,475 decline in exports. In its foreign trade movement, the year 1876 may be adjudged almost unexampled.

What are the rational conclusions to be drawn from this exhibition of changes so great, and in a business so great, as to be of commanding importance to the financial situation, especially when that situation is as delicate as that of the United States at present? We see the panic reverse the movement of foreign trade almost as sharply and completely as an engineer reverses his engine, and then see the changed movement continue with scarcely an interruption, until it seems to have culminated in the third year following. That it has culminated yet is not quite certain, but at least the inference is clear that the causes of the crisis were deeper and its operation more thorough than was generally supposed. The great fact which stands out—the changes in the specie movement having comparatively little significance—is that a heavy decline of purchases abroad is coupled with a heavy increase of sales abroad.

TAILORS AND TRUTH.

It is the invariable habit of the tailor, when exhibiting a piece of goods which he remarks, "will make up beautiful," to assure his customer that it is "all wool." This assurance is never believed, and the tailor knows that it never will be. Hence he regards it as a mere conventional form of speech, intended to add a gaudy lustre to the dull routine of business, and devoid of any moral bearing. Some of our most profound tailors, who are at the same time as truthful as the exigencies of their business will permit, stoutly maintain that no real violation of the truth is involved in this assertion, and that the theory that a tailor is guilty of falsehood in calling cotton "all wool" is a morbid and wholly unjustifiable one.

No man can violate a long-established custom with impunity. There are instances on record in which the sudden telling of the truth by a reckless and selfish politician has proved the ruin of his party. For a tailor to either abstain from the customary assurance that his cloth is "all wool," or to actually sell cloth of which that assurance is literally and completely true, would be to invite a convulsion of nature or some equally vigorous calamity. Hitherto, no tailor has tried the hazardous experiment, but now we are told of an English tailor who sold an exclusively woolen piece of cloth under the usual guaranty that it was "all wool," and thereby struck a blow at the whole fabric of English society, besides seriously damaging the Established Church.

It happened in this wise: Rev. Dr. Owen was the Rector of a rural parish, who accepted an invitation to visit a fair parishioner who was devoted to the Church and addicted to dogs. A woman may be known by the dogs she keeps; and the fact that Mrs. Honeywood, the fair parishioner in question, kept a Pyreneean wolf-dog, shows that she had a soul above croquet, worsted-work, and the frivolities that characterize the woman who associates with poodles and King Charles spaniels. When the good Rector visited her, she led him forth into the garden to discuss the condition of the heathen and to show him her dog. He entered that garden a placid, clean, and contented clergyman, but he was destined to emerge from it a demoralized, denuded, and partially disintegrated man.

The dog was young, and was unacquainted with the taste or scent of clergymen. He was naturally an intelligent dog who had made the most of his educational facilities, and had already learned the difference in flavor between the legs of the footman, the "buttons," and the house-maid. Had clergymen been thrown in his way, he would undoubtedly have sampled a few of them, and having thus satisfied his thirst for knowledge, would have abstained from further ecclesiastical investigations. It certainly was not his fault that when he saw his first clergyman, in the person of Rev. Dr. Owen, he mentally remarked, "Here's something new in legs," and promptly proceed to collect data with a view to their classification as a species distinct from the household legs with which he was already familiar.

No sooner had this enterprising animal made a few preliminary sniffs at Dr. Owen's legs, and tasted a trifle of coat-tail, than he retired a few paces, in order to get a fair start, and then sprang upon his victim with violent and determined yells. For the next five minutes the air was filled with fragments of cloth and clergyman, and a welkin, which happened to be conveniently near, rang like a patent railway switch bell. Mrs. Honeywood, with great presence of mind, went into the house for a broom and dust-pan, being unwilling that a Dissenting house-maid should have the privilege of sweeping up the Rector. By the time she had returned to the scene with her household implements the greater part of the Rector had escaped over the palings, and the infuriated dog was worrying the larger pieces that had been left behind.

Fearful that the accident might create a coolness between herself and her spiritual guide, Mrs. Honeywood wrote him a note, apologizing for the playfulness of her pet, and hoping that it had not caused him "any inconvenience." She also sent him a partially chewed rag, remarking, "I found the inclosed piece of cloth on the gravel walk, and send it to you, as I think it belongs to your great-coat, and you may be able to put it in." Strange as it may seem, this cheerful note did not produce the desired effect. The Rector answered it, but he also procured a summons requiring Mrs. Honeywood to answer the charge of keeping a dangerous wild beast.

It is interesting to note the sequence of events that, to the careless observer, seem to be totally unconnected. The disintegration of Rev. Dr. Owen was due solely to the fact that his tailor had told the truth. The reverend gentleman himself proved this fact in an eloquent and learned dissertation upon his calamity. "My tailors," he remarked, "warrant their goods to be of fine wool, wholly free from any mixture of cotton. The keen hound ascertained this fact by scent and next by taste, and then literally jumped at the conclusion that beneath the sheep's clothing lurked the wolf." The dog, it must be remembered, was a wolf-dog, whose ancestors for centuries hunted the fierce Pyreneean wolf, and who was well aware that it is the habit of the wolf to dress himself in sheep's skin, in order to ply in comparative safety his infamous trade. When the dog found "all-wool" clothing inclosing something that by no stretch of canine imagination could be regarded as a sheep, he naturally decided that he had detected a wolf in illicit practices, and thereupon tore him to pieces to such an extent as circumstances permitted.

All this would have been avoided if the excessively and unnecessarily truthful tailors had sold the clergyman the usual mixture conventionally called "all wool." The suspicions of the dog would not have been aroused, the clergyman would not have been "worried," and he would not have prosecuted his parishioner. Doubtless, no such event will ever again occur; but the next time some eccentric tailor feels a morbid impulse to make his cloth literally answer to the description "all wool," he should remember the fate of Dr. Owen, and reconsider his rash purpose.

AMUSEMENTS.

THE OPERA BOUFFE.

"La Fille de Mme. Angot" was given at the Eagle Theatre, last evening. The performance was a respectable one at all points, and, so far as the two principal personages were concerned, the opera has under no circumstances had a better representation. Mlle. Aimée still personates Clairette and while her portrayal is, in a dramatic sense, as lively, as piquant, and as droll as heretofore, her singing is certainly more artistic than ever, and quite as significant as it is finished. The lady manages her voice with far greater skill than she possessed some years since, and in such really graceful and daintily-written music as Lecocq's, quality of tone and excellence of phrasing are of special importance. To the more "pronounced" numbers of the score, Mlle. Aimée's vivacity and emphasis are, of course, equal, and the quarrel-duets and Clairette's assertion of her rights and privileges as Mme. Angot's Daughter were, yesterday evening, loudly applauded. M. Raoult is a capital Ange Pitou. He invests the sweet and semi-sentimental airs allotted to the character with the requisite charm of morbidezza, and the actor's lack of humor is not apparent, as in other rôles, thanks to the half-poetical type he represents. The remainder of the cast does not call for notice. The house, last night, was crowded in every part.

NORTH CAROLINA REPUDIATORS.

Speaking of the ante-war bonds of North Carolina, the Raleigh Observer (Democratic, of course) says in its issue of the 1st inst.: "No man who raised his hand against North Carolina during the late war has now any claim upon the State in honor or in morals. If any such has any claim in law, to the law let him look for its enforcement. To the payment of claims of ante-war bondholders, not citizens, who gave neither aid nor comfort to the war against us, of course no such objection can be made, save that growing out of our poverty; and, in theory at least, they are to be paid in such measure and at such time as we may be able to pay. But what about the handful of our own people who hold ante-war bonds? They contend that they ought to be paid. We reply that their case is, indeed, a hard one, but we deny that it is any harder than that of the owners of war bonds, or than that of the owners of negroes. War bonds were property and negroes were property just as ante-war bonds were property. Is there any reason in natural justice and equity why a man should be compelled to lose a negro or a war bond rather than an ante-war bond? The law made them all property. It is an old and an approved maxim in equity that he who asks equity must himself first do equity. Are owners of old bonds prepared to say that owners of negroes and owners of war bonds ought to be paid? If they are not prepared so to say, with what pretense to equal dealing can they claim payment for old bonds? Which is the greater injustice, to leave the negro property unpaid for and to pay the bonds, or to leave both just where the war left them? The negro owners and the war-bond owners are our own people. The ante-war bond owners are but few of them North Carolinians. If the old bondholders are entitled to be paid, then the war-bond owners are entitled to be paid, and so are the negro owners."

MR. STEPHENS' ILLNESS.

The Augusta (Ga.) Chronicle prints an extract from a private letter from a friend of Hon. Alexander H. Stephens, in Washington, in which the writer says: "Mr. Stephens has been unable to write or dictate answers to his numerous correspondents. He is again prostrated, and requires constant watching day and night. I cannot dispel the idea that he is laboring under a disease of the heart, which will sooner or later break the brittle thread that binds him to earth. He has become greatly depressed in spirits within the past 36 hours. It is not because he is afraid that his end is near, but it is because of the peculiar symptoms of the disease and the disappointment of not being able to participate in the discussion of the Electoral bill while before the House. He has been exceedingly anxious to do something for his country in this her emergency, and to put upon record the evidence of his sincere desire to secure her peace, prosperity, and happiness. While disapproving some of the features of the Electoral bill, yet, had he been in his seat to-day, he would have both spoken and voted for it."

THE DEATH ROLL IN PARIS.

PASSED OVER TO THE MAJORITY.

A HUMORIST, THE SISTER OF RACHEL, AND THE EDITOR OF THE REVUE DES DEUX MONDES—SOMETHING ABOUT ALL OF THEM.

PARIS, Wednesday, Jan. 17, 1877.

The carnival season is by no means gay, and, for all the high hopes we cherished a fortnight ago, 1877 begins in a lugubrious fashion. The weather is superb, but it seems unseasonable. All persons afflicted with gout would do well to avoid Paris at this moment, for they will live in the midst of tortures while hearing people insolently strong and healthy rejoicing in the state of the weather. Since the beginning of the century there has been but one season at all comparable to this—the fine Indian Summer days having lasted until near the advent of Spring, yet the Faculty assures us that such weather is unseasonable and unhealthy. Zymotic diseases are prevalent. Typhoid and typhus fevers are causing alarm on account of the fatal character they have assumed, and Summer complaints are by no means rare. The death rate has largely increased. During the first fortnight of the year an unusually large number of persons "passed over to the majority," and among them several known to fame. There was Henri Monnier, the creator of Joseph Prudhomme, the type of the French bourgeois. Every visitor to France and every reader of French knows M. Prudhomme, whose figure is given every week in the illustrated papers. It was Henri Monnier who first brought out this character, but the Comte de Noé, better known over his signature of "Cham," has been mainly instrumental in rendering it famous. For the benefit of those who have never read French, let me say that the celebrated caricaturist is the second son of Count Noah, (Noé,) and hence he signs himself "Shem," or "Cham,"—pronounced "Kam"—as this Biblical name is written in French. "Cham" has succeeded to his father's title, and is now the Comte de Noé himself, though he continues his artistic career. Every week he prints in The Charivari the result of his meditations upon men and things, and, though largely used during the past decade or so, his crayon has lost none of its brilliancy. "Cham" has made the figure of Joseph Prudhomme known to the entire world, and presents him weekly with his wise saws and apothegms. His mode of reasoning is peculiar, and peculiar, I may add, to the class to which he belongs. He is always the essence of the bourgeoisie. "I do not like spinach," exclaims M. Prudhomme at a public dinner, "and I am very glad that I do not, for if I did like it I should eat some, and there is nothing I detest so much as spinach." And when the firemen come to present a sword to M. Prudhomme, he rises in his dignified way and begins his speech with the words: "Gentlemen, this sabre is the happiest day of my life!" M. Prudhomme is an irresistibly droll character when one understands French thoroughly, and particularly the esprit of the trading classes, and I can only liken him to Mr. Pickwick. Nothing is more laughable than M. Prudhomme in a court of justice, when he persists in saying nothing at all in a flood of pompous words, and ends with a burst of patriotism. Naturally, M. Prudhomme changes his politics with every change of Government, and every régime. He was a stanch royalist under Charles X.; he became a Constitutionalist under Louis Philippe; a Republican in 1848, and a stanch friend of the Emperor after the coup d'état. Henri Monnier was the creator of this fine character, who is full of virtues despite his childishness and his faults, and he and "Cham" have had the talent necessary to keep the original idea in accord with the times, that is, ever fresh and new. Monnier belonged to that remarkable literary epoch known as "1830." He was a contemporary with Thiers, Guizot, De Rémusat, De Balzac, Georges Sand, and others during the period of their literary triumphs, and was, therefore, a man far advanced in years at the time of his death.

On the very day that Monnier was buried another person known to fame of a certain sort was reported at the point of death. The rumor spread rapidly at the dramatist's funeral. The next day the journals announced that Sarah Félix was no more. It would be difficult to explain to American readers why Sarah Félix was famous, since she never showed the dramatic talents of her sisters. When it is stated that she was the elder sister of Rachel, the readers of the latter's biographies will comprehend the person. Many years ago the Félix family belonged to the class known as saltimbanques, or the jugglers, tumblers, and traders of the country fairs. One day Sarah and Rachel Félix, aged respectively four and three years, were left together by the roadside while their parents were engaged at the fair. The little Rachel saw a lot of cakes, and at once felt hungry. She began to cry for them, and Sarah tried to calm her. When the people stopped to inquire what was the matter they were reassured by the smiles of the two children. Suddenly an idea came into Sarah's mind. She began to sing, and her infantile voice at once attracted a crowd. Little Rachel adopted her rôle instinctively. She too sang, and demurely passed round her apron to receive the sous that poured in upon her. The two ran off to buy cakes, and were so delighted with their success that they tried it again and again, gorging themselves with gingerbread every day. At length Father Félix caught them at the trick, and from that moment the two children were taken into his service, and forced to perform for his benefit.

This was the beginning of Rachel's dramatic career. When the family came to Paris Rachel pursued her studies, and Sarah helped the mother tend a home that was poorly provided and was often without sufficient bread. Sarah performed the same duties when her sister became rich and famous, and was noted as a bonne femme de ménage. She accompanied her sister, taking the admirers off her hands when there was a superfluity, and attending in the rôle of a suivante the gay dinners and suppers which princes gave to the great actress. Rachel died young, as every one knows, leaving young children to be cared for, and when Mother Félix died Sarah became the mother of the family. She had, besides, her younger sister, Lia Félix, now a famous artiste in the tragic drama. And Sarah did so well for this numerous family that she became universally respected. When money became scarce she bravely went into trade, and brought out her famous "Fairy Water," which is the most prominent cosmetic of the day. She gained a considerable fortune by it, and, after providing for all the Félix family, built a home for herself. The other night she was at the theatre, and on going out could not find her carriage. Taking a cab home, she found her coachman drunk. On ringing the bell she got no response, the porter being in the same condition; and on going up stairs she found the kerosene lamps extinguished and the rooms full of bad odors. She flew into a rage at this spectacle, as any woman would, perhaps, and began to reproach her chamber-maid. Suddenly she cried, "O! my head! my head!" and fell upon a sofa. Poor Sarah Félix was attacked with paralysis of the brain, and died from it a few hours later.

My letter has taken a necrological turn, and I must give a paragraph to our last dead celebrity, M. Buloz, of the Revue des Deux Mondes. It was only the other day that I wrote of his quarrel with M. Wittersteim about the publication of the official Journals. The Assembly wanted to withdraw from him the Bulletin des Lois, and did erase the 40,000 francs subvention from the budget. At the same time the Senate recognized that he had a ground for complaint and authorized him to bring suit against the State. It is probable that he would have obtained a large indemnity, for the Government was in what might be called a "fix," and was willing to pay a considerable sum to avoid the annoyance of two official printers. M. Buloz was one of the sturdy mountaineers produced by Savoy, the country of Victor Emmanuel. He was half peasant, half gentleman, and exercised great influence in his district. When his comatriots come to Paris it is generally as coal-dealers, as chestnut-roasters, or with marmot and hurdy-gurdy. Who has not seen the little Savoyards by the roadside, with their broad hats, and sort of wood-chuck nestling in their bosoms? The marmot is brought out to perform, and goes fast asleep the moment it is let alone. M. Buloz was a Savoyard, who would have made his fortune even with a marmot and musette, for he had in him the elements of a grand character. His enemies say that he succeeded by his meanness and avariciousness, but prominent characters are always marks for the shafts of malice. On arriving at Paris M. Buloz found a small penny review and bought it. In a few years' time it became a power. Few Americans, perhaps, appreciate the real power exercised by the Revue des Deux Mondes, which has an enormous circulation in all civilized countries.

In personal appearance M. Buloz was always the Savoyard peasant, and continued to wear hob-nailed shoes to the day of his death. His linen was nearly always coarse and decidedly reproachable, and his manners were not always endurable. In his office he reigned as an autocrat, and the best writers of France had to submit to his peculiarities. He had his own ideas about fine writing, and was implacable. Nothing could move him. Many writers got angry and withdrew their works, but he showed them to the door and left them to fume until they wearied. And they generally came back as suppliants, for it is a great honor to be admitted as a writer in the Revue. But M. Buloz was evidently a hard taskmaster, for he exacted a great deal and paid little. It was one of his rules not to pay for the first article sent in by a new writer, for in his opinion the honor of appearing in the Revue des Deux Mondes was a sufficient compensation.

NOTES FROM THE CAPITAL.

THE TEXAS PACIFIC RAILROAD LOBBY—THE APPROPRIATION FOR PUBLIC PRINTING—MISCELLANEOUS AFFAIRS.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 2.—The Texas Pacific Railroad lobby is still hard at work, and still has hopes of success. The present programme is to keep quiet until after the Presidential question has been decided, and then to rush the bill through before the end of the session. There is no doubt that an effort of this kind will be made, and a number of prominent Southern Democrats profess to believe that it will succeed.

The appropriation for public printing is now nearly exhausted. The immense amount of evidence printed by order of Congress has drawn rapidly from the fund, and the Public Printer will inform Congress that if an appropriation is not speedily made the public printing will have to stop. The Congressional Record is specially appropriated for, so that the printing of it will continue without regard to the other printing of the Government.

The Secretary of War to-day transmitted to the House of Representatives, as an answer to Mr. Jenks' resolution of Jan. 19, 1876, requesting a general and exact survey of the distances on the Union Pacific and Central Pacific Railways between Council Bluffs and Sacramento, the report of Capt. Twining, of the Engineer Corps, to whom this duty was assigned. This report shows that the length of each of these railways is somewhat greater than was shown by the original measurement upon which the subsidies were issued. The amount of the error is for the Union Pacific one mile and a quarter, and for the Central Pacific a little less than a mile. The track has been changed in several places since the completion of the road in order to obtain a better location. These changes have been in every instance examined by the Army Engineers, who find that the change of length is immaterial, being only a few hundreds of feet.

The President sent the following nominations to the Senate to-day: Channing Richards, to be United States Attorney for the Southern District of Ohio; C. C. Slade, to be Collector of Customs for the District of Paso Del Norte, in the State of Texas and the Territory of New-Mexico; James H. Master, to be Postmaster at Cohoes, N. Y.; Isaac R. Dinkelberger, to be Postmaster at Los Angeles, Cal.; L. D. F. Peore, to be Receiver of Public Moneys at Springfield, Dakota; Isaac Clements, to be Pension Agent at Salem, Ill.; N. H. Owings, to be Secretary of the Territory of Washington.

The internal revenue receipts to-day were $403,796 28; Customs receipts, $337,177 57.

A telegram from Virginia City, Nev., dated to-day, says: "The Sutro Tunnel progressed 148 feet for the 10 days preceding yesterday. It has now reached a length of 15,865 feet, and has fairly entered the mineral belt. Fifteen inches of warm water were struck yesterday."

John Sexton was to-day appointed Internal Revenue Gauger for the First District of Missouri.

J. H. Maddox, the Treasury agent who has been giving testimony in the Louisiana case before the Committee on the Powers, Privileges, and Duties of the House, was to-day removed from his official position as an agent of the Internal Revenue Bureau. The removal of Maddox was determined upon by the President yesterday, and the President consequently sent for Col. S. E. Chamberlain, now of Virginia, and formerly an officer of the regular Army, and tendered the place to him to-day. The offer was immediately accepted, and this afternoon Commissioner Raum notified Maddox that he was from this date dismissed from the service of the Internal Revenue office, and the commission of Col. Chamberlain was signed.

Hon. Alexander H. Stephens is evidently better to-day. His physicians are greatly encouraged.

THE OREGON CONSPIRACY.

A FURTHER VIEW IN THE TELEGRAPHIC HISTORY OF THE PLOT.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 2.—The investigation of the Oregon Electoral case was continued before the Senate Committee on Privileges and Elections to-day. C. B. Bellinger, Chairman of the Oregon Democratic Committee, was recalled. His testimony was simply corroborative of that previously given by himself and other Democratic witnesses. The following telegrams were introduced in evidence by Senator Mitchell:

OMAHA, Neb., Nov. 25.

L. A. Grover, Salem, Oregon:
Man left Omaha to see you; will arrive Monday. Delay action. GEORGE L. MILLER.
Dec. 6.

To Col. W. T. Pelton, New-York:
Glory be to God. Hold on to one Electoral vote in Oregon. I have 100,000 men to back it up.
CORSE.
WASHINGTON, Dec. 8.

To Judge Strong, Salem, Oregon:

OMAHA, Neb., Dec. —.

Col. W. T. Pelton, No. 15 Gramercy Park, New-York:
Ignorant whole business. Partner powerful motives to fidelity on Gould order. Can it not be done through A. Kountze, No. 19 Wall, or myself, or both. Kountz, Tiedmish Republican, reliable beyond doubt. Last resort, protect everybody, and use Davis. Answer. GEORGE L. MILLER.

There were no marks on the dispatch signed "Corse" to indicate the place from which it was sent.

THE EASTERN QUESTION.

THREE CHRISTIANS TO BE APPOINTED BY THE PORTE TO GOVERNORSHIPS OF PROVINCES—THE GREEK POPULATION—THE SITUATION IN ROUMANIA—THE RUSSIAN CIRCULAR TO THE POWERS.

LONDON, Feb. 2.—Gen. Ignatieff has arrived at Brindisi, and the Marquis of Salisbury has left Rome for London.

A dispatch from Constantinople says the Porte has sent a dispatch to its representatives abroad, giving notice of the appointment of three Christians to the Governorships of provinces, and declaring that the application of the reforms is proceeding unremittingly.

A dispatch from Berlin says: "Greece, it is reported, has notified her representatives abroad that M. Comoundouros, President of the Council, intimated to the Marquis of Salisbury, that in view of the failure of the conference, and the prospect of continued misrule and unredressed grievances, the Government cannot longer undertake to restrain the Greek population in Turkey from seeking to obtain their rights by their own efforts."

LONDON, Feb. 3.—A dispatch from Constantinople says the Porte, answering Prince Nikita's inquiry as to what conditions it will accord as a basis for negotiations, has stated that it is willing to negotiate on the basis of the status quo ante bellum, with a rectification of the frontier.

The Vienna correspondent of a morning paper reports that Roumania is resolved to grant numerous military furloughs, because she is embarrassed as to how to disband her troops without causing unpleasantness with the Russian corps whose arrival is expected, and concerning whose marching route Russia has made overtures to the Ministry. A telegram from Bucharest announces that all the Roumanian Ministers except the Premier, M. Bratiano, have tendered their resignations, in consequence, probably, of the movement in the Chambers in favor of retrenchment in military expenditures.

Russian journals say Gen. Ignatieff will go to Kisheneff by way of Vienna, and thence to St. Petersburg. The Russian Telegraphic Agency reports that Gortschakoff's circular was dispatched on Thursday night, and will reach the powers on Monday. It could not be issued until all the Ambassadors had quitted Constantinople. A dispatch from Berlin says goods traffic has been resumed on all the Russian railways.

A special dispatch from Rustchuk to the Cologne Gazette says the Turks are sending considerable reinforcements to Widdin and Shumla. On Jan. 29 the force at Widdin consisted of 57 infantry battalions, 82 cannon, and 2 regiments of cavalry; Shumla had 28 battalions of infantry, 6 field-batteries, and a cavalry regiment. An exemption tax of from 10 to 20 piastres is levied in Bulgaria on every male over 15 years of age. The last levy of Turkey is now being called out. The military authorities at Shumla have decided to call out the Circassians only at the last moment. The latter will form a force of 25,000 to be stationed between Shumla and Varna.

The special dispatch from Vienna says the standstill in the negotiations between Turkey and Servia continues. The Times, in its leader to-day, gives credit to the report that the Russian notes to the Powers has been dispatched.

A dispatch to a morning paper from Vienna says Midhat Pasha has expressed the intention of making an arrangement with Austria for the return of the Bosnian refugees in Austria, who still number 80,000, and a re in deep distress. No success in the negotiations between Montenegro and Turkey is anticipated in Vienna, as Austria would oppose the annexation of Suttorina by Montenegro.

CONSTANTINOPLE, Feb. 2.—A Stamboul newspaper asserts that the Prince of Montenegro has telegraphed that it is impossible to entertain direct negotiations for peace, as his subjects would dethrone him if he did.

MISCELLANEOUS FOREIGN NOTES.

LONDON, Feb. 2.—The Gazette, in a special edition, announces that all markets or sales of cattle, sheep, or goats are prohibited in London except when specially licensed by the Privy Council, or when animals for sale have been on the premises of the vendor, and have been free from disease for a month previous to the sale. Animals sold must be killed within 10 days after the sale.

A dispatch from Paris says the severe sentence passed on the Droits de l'Homme is creating excitement in Parliamentary circles. A meeting of the Left was held to-day, at which the Gambettists were especially prominent. It is expected that the Left will interpellate the Government on the subject. The Left consider that a law which admits of such severities should be modified.

PARIS, Feb. 2.—M. Leon Joseph Gatoyes, musician and critic, died to-day, aged 71 years.

LONDON, Feb. 3.—A Berlin correspondent reports that the Public Prosecutor has instituted proceedings against the son of Count von Arnim on account of offensive newspaper articles.

RESIGNATION OF GOV. GROVER, OF OREGON.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

PORTLAND, Feb. 2.—Prior to leaving Washington, Hon. L. F. Grover filed his resignation as Governor of Oregon, the same to take effect Feb. 1. Pursuant to this understanding, Hon. S. F. Chadwick, Secretary of State, was informally inaugurated at the Capitol yesterday. Chief Justice Prim administered the oath of office. The inaugural ceremonies were conducted in an unostentatious manner, only a few persons being present. The executive functions will not be formally assumed until Grover's return from the East, which will be within a week. Gov. Chadwick's term of office will not expire until the second Monday in September, 1878.

THE INDIANS UNUSUALLY QUIET.

CHEYENNE, Feb. 2.—The following, from a reliable party at the Red Cloud Agency, dated Jan. 31, gives the condition of affairs at that agency: "The Sioux and Arapaho scouts who took part in the Mackenzie fight were mustered out and paid off yesterday, and are immensely pleased with their treatment, and are convinced that loyalty pays. The policy pursued here since last October has been a success. The change that has taken place in the attitude of the Indians since the disarmament is wonderful. One can scarcely believe that the Indians one now sees here submissively obeying the slightest behest of the Agent can be the same as those who last May showed such supreme contempt for the Government and its desires. There is no news as yet from the party who went out some time ago to communicate with the hostile Indians. The Cheyennes succeeded in stealing 11 ponies from this party after its departure from this point. Last Saturday a trapper named Knapt, while following his avocation on Cottonwood Creek, 40 miles northwest of Fort Laramie, was surprised and killed by Cheyennes. His brother, who was with him at the time, escaped."

MARINE DISASTERS.

LONDON, Feb. 2.—The Norwegian bark Veranda, Capt. Christopherson, from Bremen, has been totally wrecked at Lerwick. The Danish ship Dr. Barth, Capt. Hansen, from Bordeaux Nov. 23, for Pensacola, has put into Teneriffe leaking badly, and must dock.

PROVIDENCE, Feb. 2.—The steamer McClellan, hence for Baltimore, went ashore on Dutch Island at 1 A. M. The revenue cutter Samuel Dexter has gone to her assistance.

PHILADELPHIA, Feb. 2.—The bark Eliza White, before reported, has completed her repairs at Marcus Hook, and sailed for Boston this morning. The bark Pellicano, ashore on Cherry Island Flats, is discharging her cargo with two ice-boats alongside.

THE REVOLT IN MEXICO.

SAN FRANCISCO, Feb. 2.—A San Diego dispatch says: The advices from Sonora are very gloomy. Both the Pasquieras are united in revolt against the Mariscal Government. They are said to have 1,500 men under arms, and expect reinforcements from Sinaloa and Chihuahua. It is reported that a fight of two hours' duration occurred at Ures a week ago. Mariscal has sent to other places for additional troops, the Pasquieras forces outnumbering his. The people are said to be discouraged, and are disposed to believe that peace and order can only be secured by the intervention of a foreign power.

NAVIGATION OPENED AT ST. LOUIS.

ST. LOUIS, Feb. 2.—After being ice-bound for 56 days the river finally burst its bonds between 10 and 11 o'clock this morning, and ice has been passing the city, but not in great quantities, ever since. Navigation southward is re-

INTERNATIONAL SCIENTIFIC SERVICE.

BUFFALO, Feb. 2.—Prof. A. R. Grote this evening, at a meeting of the Society of Natural Science, read a paper on the "Origin of Man," which proposes the formation of an International Scientific Service, to be held neutral and its flag to be protected by international law. Stations are to be established at localities designated by special scientists, for the purpose of taking all classes of observations with reference to the question of the origin of man. Stations in Madagascar and the Arctic regions are insisted on. The solution of this latter question will be attended by a betterment of the condition of man by inducing a habit of thought in accordance with the facts in the case.

STEAMER COLLISION AT CAIRO, ILL.

CAIRO, Feb. 2.—Last night the steamer Charles Morgan ran into the little steamer Aggie, below Osceola. Charles McCarthy, a deck passenger on the latter vessel, who was asleep on a cotton bale at the time of the collision, was so badly crushed that he died soon after landing here. He was given 24 hours to leave the South, and, taking what he could, he started for the North to seek his fortunes as best he could. For some time he has been filling the position of Station Master at the Lincoln depot, on the Fitchburg Railroad. FROM THE GROUNDS.

HIGHEST MEDAL EXHIBITS.

ARTIFICIAL DENTURES BY J. ALLEN & SON.

This display was in a handsome show-case, and contained, besides several remarkable relics and curiosities, over twenty sets of artificial teeth, showing the very latest improvements in their manufacture. Dr. Allen has a system of constructing artificial dentures which, in its present perfection, he attains several important advantages. He succeeds, by the use of a beautiful flesh colored enamel, in producing a seamless gum, natural expression of the teeth, a perfect roof and rugæ of the mouth, and, also in restoring the original contour of the face.

The International Jury at the Centennial Exhibition was greatly pleased with the exhibit, made a most favorable report upon it to the United States Centennial Commission, who awarded to him a diploma of the highest merit, and a medal of honor, he has been highly complimented by the profession upon the ingenious devices he has introduced, and he also received the highest commendation from both the Paris and the Vienna Expositions. In Paris the Jury on Dentistry pronounced Dr. Allen's "incomparably the most beautiful pieces exhibited," while at Vienna, they were "classified" in the report "with the highest works of art."

The address is Dr. J. Allen & Son, No. 7 West Thirty-third street, New-York City.

ATTEMPTED SUICIDE IN NEWARK.

Between 1 and 2 o'clock yesterday afternoon a man was found lying insensible in the hallway of Kimball's furnishing store, corner of Broad and Bank streets, Newark. A stretcher was procured, and he was conveyed to the station-house, where it was discovered that he had swallowed a dose of laudanum with the intention of committing suicide. He said his name was C. H. Peterson, and that he was a school teacher, residing at No. 82 Garden street. On being questioned as to his motives for committing suicide, he said he was excited, but refused to give any further explanation. He expressed regret at not having taken the poison in some more out-of-the-way place, where he would not have been discovered until he was dead. In a short time he fell into a stupor from which he had not rallied at a late hour last evening, and it is thought he cannot recover.

SHAKESPEARE says:

"The purest treasure mortal times afford
Is spotless reputation: that away,
Men are but gilded loam or painted clay."

The reputation of B. T. BABBITT as an honest and skillful manufacturer, is without a peer, and it is to make others spotless in body as well as character that his life-work has been devoted. His "NEW TOILET SOAP" as a toilet article is superior to all others, and, once known, it will banish all other soaps from the toilet sanctum.—Advertisement.

FRIDAY, Feb. 2—P. M.

In the dealings on the Stock Exchange to-day the speculation in Western Union constituted the most interesting feature, the transactions in the stock amounting to nearly one-half the entire business. The bull clique, who have for sometime past been resting on their oars, made a very determined attempt to put up the price, but their efforts in this direction were attended with a very small measure of success, as the highest point attained was only 77, while in the final dealings the stock sold at 75¾, an advance of only ¼ ₱ cent. from the opening quotation. This meagre result would seem to indicate either that holders of the stock are willing to supply the street with it at any advance upon the prevailing quotation or else that the members of the pool are not keeping good faith with one another.

The entire transactions for the day amounted to 114,575 shares, which embraced 43,700 Western Union, 26,200 Lake Shore, 14,600 Delaware, Lackawanna and Western, 7,300 New-Jersey Central, 6,200 Milwaukee and St. Paul, 4,100 Michigan Central, 3,100 Erie, and 2,200 Pacific Mail.

The speculation in the coal shares was marked by frequent fluctuations, which were, however, confined within a comparatively narrow range. Delaware, Lackawanna and Western opened at 69, advanced to 69¾, declined to 68¾, with closing sales at 69. New-Jersey Central, after advancing to 27¼, became weak, and declined to 25⅛, closing at a recovery of ⅛ ₱ cent. from the lowest point. Delaware and Hudson Canal recorded an improvement of 1 ₱ cent. Lake Shore opened at 55¼, rose to 55½, subsequently, with occasional fluctuations, declining to 54¾, which was the closing figure. Michigan Central fluctuated between 46⅛ and 47⅛, and closed at 46¾. The Granger shares were dull and steady. New-York Central and Rock Island made a fractional advance. Illinois Central rose from 51⅝ to 52½, closing at a reaction of ½ ₱ cent. Express shares were neglected.

The money market continues extremely easy, and borrowers on call were supplied today at 3@4 ₱ cent., the offerings at these rates being in excess of the demand. Discounts are unchanged. The national bank notes received at Washington for redemption amounted to $500,000. The following were the rates of exchange on New-York at the under-mentioned cities to-day: Savannah, buying, par; selling, ⅛@¼ premium; Charleston, easier; buying, ¼@¾; selling, 1-16@par; Cincinnati, quiet and steady; buying, par; selling, 1-10 premium; Chicago, par to 25 premium; St. Louis, 50 premium, and New-Orleans, commercial, par@1-32 premium; bank, ⅛ premium.

The foreign advices reported British Consols weak and fractionally lower in price, and American securities firm and unchanged in value. At London, Consols for both money and the account closed at 95⅝@95¾, against 95⅞@96 yesterday. United States old 1865s closed at 105½, 1867s at 110@110⅛, 10-40s at 110½, and new 5s at 107½. Erie common sold at 9¾, and Reading bonds at 59⅛@60½. The Bank of England lost £162,000 to-day on balance. In the London market bar silver sold at 57⅝d. ₱ ounce.

The sterling exchange market was firm, and closed with actual business at $4 84½@$4 84¾ for bankers sixty-day bills, and at $4 85½@$4 86 for demand. The business for to-morrow's steamers was only moderate in amount.

The gold speculation was firmer to-day, although comparatively dull. The price declined at the opening from 105⅛ to 105, but an advance soon followed to 105⅜. During the afternoon the sales were alternately at 105⅛ and 105¼, the market closing at the latter figure. The advance to-day is only natural in view of the recent steady decline and the "short" interest, which was partly closed up to-day. On gold loans the rates ranged from 4½ to 3 ₱ cent. for carrying.

Government bonds were firm and higher, partly in sympathy with gold. The improvement ranged from ⅛ to ⅜ ₱ cent., the latter in new 5s, which sold as high as 110⅜ for coupon and 110⅜ for registered; 10-40s, coupon, rose to 113¾. Sales of 1867s were made at 112⅝@112¾ for coupon and at 112½c@112⅞ for registered. Railroad bonds were generally firm and higher. New-Jersey Central Firsts, new, advanced to 102, do. Convertibles to 74, Great Western Secondsto 73, Hannibal and St. Joseph Convertible to 86, Union Pacific Firsts to 104¼, do. Land Grants to 103, and Sinking Funds to 97⅜. New-York Central coupon Firsts sold at 117¼, Harlem coupon Firsts at 120, Chicago, Burlington and Quincy 8s at 111¾@112, Fort Wayne Firsts at 120, Erie 2d at 104, do. 3d at 104½, do. 5th at 102, and Rock Island 7s at 108⅞. Milwaukee and St. Paul Consolidated Sinking Funds declined from 82 to 81¼. Toledo and Wabash first, St. Louis Division, were 1 ₱ cent. lower, selling down to 80¼. Toledo and Wabash Firsts sold at 91½, this being ex the past due and current coupons. In State bonds, New-York 6s of 1891 brought 124. Tennessee old sold at 43, North Carolina old, January and July, at 20¾, and do., April and October at 21¼@21⅝. Sales of District of Columbia 3.65s were made at 71⅞@72, ex interest.

The imports of dry goods at the port of New-York for the week ending this date were $2,614,416, and the amount marketed, $2,570,113. The total imports of dry goods at the port since Jan. 1 were $9,046,747, and the amount marketed, $8,849,605.

FOREIGN BUSINESS AFFAIRS.

LIVERPOOL, Feb. 2.—A leading grain circular, in its review of the week, says: "Dullness in trade continues and is increased by the bad condition of native wheat. At the market it is very unsalable, and in many districts dry qualities as well as foreign are 6d. to 1s. cheaper, with a general tendency toward a decline, even where an actual reduction is not quoted. Since Tuesday business on the spot has been inanimate, and where sales have been made a reduction of 1s. per quarter has been mostly accepted. Maize is likewise drooping. At this market to-day white wheats in limited quantity sold at fully 1d. under Tuesday's prices, but at the concession millers were disposed to purchase freely. Red was almost neglected, though generally offered at the above decline. Flour was dull and lower. Corn was in fair consumptive demand and 3d. to 6d. lower."

The circular of the Liverpool Cotton Brokers' Association, reviewing the trade for the week ending last night, says: "Cotton has been inanimate throughout the week, and prices are generally lower. American was in small demand early in the week

ALBANY.

BUSINESS IN BOTH HOUSES.

ANOTHER LIVELY DEBATE IN THE ASSEMBLY—PASSAGE OF THE DISTRICT COURT CLERKS BILL—NEW BILLS INTRODUCED—INSURANCE LEGISLATION IN THE SENATE.

ALBANY, Friday, Feb. 2, 1877.

Very little was done in the Assembly this morning, the session being somewhat shorter than usual, beyond the passage of the bill to pay the District Court Clerks in New-York. The bill had been recommitted for amendment, with power to report at any time, and when the order of third reading was reached, Mr. Strahan reported the bill, and moved that it have its third reading. Three or four opponents of the measure were ready in an instant to oppose it, but Mr. Alvord got in before them and moved the previous question. Points of order and questions of privilege were raised on all sides, but without avail. The House was tired of the subject, and seemed to dread another opening of the flood-gates of talk upon it. The previous question was ordered, but there was so much explanation of votes that the calling of the roll occupied a long time. Mr. Ruggles, and one or two other recognized lawyers on the floor, declared that under no circumstances could the City be called upon to pay two sets of clerks, and this declaration had the effect of bringing in a number of doubtful men, so that the bill finally went through with a heavy majority.

Mr. Hodges offered the following, which went over under the rule:

Whereas, A resolution has been introduced into this House and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, with instructions to report at an early day some plan looking to a radical change in the present method of assessment and taxation in this State; and whereas, it is not probable that the said committee will be able to perfect such plan in addition to their other duties during the present session of this Legislature; and whereas, the necessity of the case does not admit of any unnecessary delay: therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on Ways and Means of this House be and they are hereby requested to report to this House at an early day a plan for a commission, to be appointed by the Governor, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, the said commission to give the whole matter of assessment and taxation thorough consideration during the recess, and report to the next Legislature of this State what changes in existing laws may be necessary, and what new features can be introduced to make a system of assessment and taxation which shall be more perfect, just, and satisfactory than the present one.

Mr. Corsa introduced a bill which, if it becomes a law, will probably deprive the firm of Brown & Vanderpoel of a good deal of lucrative practice. It provides that when the Sheriff is sued for seizure of goods, in cases where an indemnity bond has been given, the person who has given the bond may appoint his own attorneys to defend the suit. Under the law as it now stands the Sheriff is defended by his own lawyers.

Dr. Hayes brings forward a bill in relation to the sale of Croton water. The first section declares that, from and after the passage of the act, all licenses made and granted by the Department of Public Works for the sale of Croton water for shipping, building purposes, &c., shall cease and determine. The second declares that the Commissioner of Public Works shall advertise for proposals for the sale of Croton water, for the purposes referred to, for a time not exceeding three years, and shall award the contract to the highest bidder. The Commissioner is to appoint ten inspectors, who will see that the contractor faithfully discharges his obligations. The salaries of the inspectors are to be paid by the contractor, and the department is forbidden to pay any salaries to collectors of moneys for the sale of water under the contract.

Mr. O'Hare offers a bill making it a felony punishable by imprisonment at hard labor, and by a fine of treble the amount misappropriated, for any Trustee, Director, officer, or employe in any savings bank to appropriate, appiv, invest, or convert any of the funds of the institution in any way not directed and authorized by law. Any person who shall prepare, or authorize to be prepared, any false statement or report of the condition of a savings bank, or shall by affirmation or otherwise subscribe to the authenticity or truth of such misstatement, shall be deemed guilty of a felony. The second section of the bill is rather a sweeping one, since it makes it a felony for any person to be either directly or indirectly interested in any enterprise, undertaking, or venture in which deposit funds shall have been appropriated, applied, invested, or converted, otherwise than as permitted and authorized by law.

Mr. McKee, of Herkimer, brought in this morning his resolutions, (previously referred to in these dispatches,) calling upon the Canal Commissioners to make a report upon the number of laborers employed last year upon the canals. The resolutions, which went over under the rules, are sufficiently important to give entire. They read as follows:

Whereas, The small amount of revenue derived from the Erie Canal renders it imperative, for the maintenance and prosperity of the same, that the strictest economy should be observed in the expenditures for said canal, and that no needless expense or extravagance should be allowed by the proper authorities in keeping said canal in repair; and whereas, it appears from official and other statements that large numbers of men were employed and immense sums of money were expended upon said canal during the months of October and November, 1876, at a time when said canal was in good repair and navigation unobstructed; therefore be it

Resolved, That the Canal Commissioners be and they are hereby respectfully requested to report to this Assembly, within 10 days from the adoption of this resolution:

First—The total expenditures upon the Erie Canal for each of the months of April, May, June, July, August, September, October, and November, 1876, and also the number of days' labor performed upon said canal for each of said months separately, as appears upon the several Superintendents' check rolls.

Second—What amount of said expenditures was paid in each of said months to look tenders, watchmen, and other regular employes for the ordinary running of said canal.

Third—What amount of said total expenditures was paid in each of said months for extraordinary repairs upon said canal, and the reason for such expenditures.

Fourth—A specific statement of the amount of the "check roll" expenses of each Superintendent upon said canal for each of said months separately.

Fifth—Whether the Superintendents upon the several sections of said canal have complied with the requirements of the law in filing in the several County Clerks' offices an abstract or report of their expenditures for the months of October and November, 1876, and the dates of such filing, and that the information hereinbefore called for shall include the several amounts of such abstracts or reports.

Sixth—If it appear by the statements herein called for that much larger sums were expended upon said canal during the months of October and November than during any other of said months, then said Commissioners are requested to state specifically the reasons for such extra expenditures, and whether the same was required for necessary repairs or maintenance of said canal, and the nature and character of the labor performed upon the canal for said months, and what permanent improvements, if any, were made during said months of October and November upon said canal.

Mr. Stephenson introduced a bill amending the law relating to elections, by providing that the names of no county officers whatever shall be placed upon the ballot indorsed "State." All county officers are to be voted for by ballots marked "county." A separate ballot-box is required to be provided for the county ballots. This bill was in the Assembly last year, being introduced by Mr. Jacob Worth, but it failed among the crowd which railed at the end of the session.

Mr. Flecke makes another step toward reform and reorganization of the City Government by a bill, which he introduced this morning, merging the Department of Buildings in the Fire Department. The Fire Commissioners are to appoint some competent architect, who is to be known as Chief of Unsafe Buildings, and this officer is to select inspectors of buildings from among members of the fire companies. All the powers now vested in the Department of Buildings are transferred to the Fire Department. The bill will receive a thorough consideration by the Committee on Cities.

Senator Bixby this morning introduced the bill referred to in THE TIMES of yesterday, designed, as he said, to prevent the amalgamation of life insurance companies. He added that it was the first of a series of bills which he intended to introduce touching the subject of life insurance. The bill amends the law of 1853 for the incorporation of life and health insurance companies so as to allow any company to reinsure any individual risk provided it is done within six months after the risk was incurred, and not otherwise.

A TOUGH BIRD.

The Springfield (Mass.) Union says: "An incident illustrating the ferocity of butcher birds and their tenacity of life, recently occurred in this city. A gentleman saw one of these cruel creatures take a sparrow, impale him on the sharp twig of a tree and then peck at him, seemingly with almost fiendish delight. Seizing a gun the man fired at the butcher bird, and clipped off one of his legs. Undismayed by the report of the gun, and apparently thinking that the sparrow had wounded him, the butcher bird attacked the little fellow with redoubled fury, when the gentleman fired again, and both birds fell, lifeless as he supposed, on the snow. But before he could pick up his gun, the butcher bird had come to life, picked up the poor, little dead sparrow, and flattered away."

THE FINE ARTS.

KNOEDLER'S SALE OF WATER-COLORS.

On the evening of Feb. 6, there will be a sale of water-colors belonging to M. Knoedler & Co., successors of Goupil. It is not to take place at their gallery in Fifth avenue, but at the Kurtz Gallery, No. 6 East Twenty-third street, Madison square. The collection is already in position, and open for public inspection. Many noted names are represented by water-colors, pen-and-ink drawings or charcoals, of varying degrees of merit. A number of London artists will be found: Earp, Hartland, Marks, Whymper, Dibdin, Lait, A. Bouvier, Boughton, and Alma-Tadema. The latter contributes a pencil-sketch of "Children of Princess Clothilde." Dibdin is strong, as usual, in cathedrals, and Whymper shows a carefully wrought out "Sheep-washing." Two water-colors, by Boughton, in flat, subdued tints, are after the effects to be seen in tapestries, few colors being used, and the figures being outlined heavily in black. They represent "Spring" and "Winter," and strive after the conventional stiffness (to go no further back) of Italian religious pictures before Raphael. Marks has marine pieces, and Earp, Scotch landscapes. We understand that all these artists are liberally paid for their pictures in England.

Paris has something to show from quite a list of well-known artists. Gustave Doré, Regnault, Gérome, Detaille, Vibert, Leloir, Edouard Frère, Compte-Calix are all represented by pictures, some of them slight sketches, others more ambitious. Regnault's name stands over against a crayon study of Italian peasants. Doré has an acquarelle of "Jeremiah Lifting up his Voice in Lamentation." Beards and important folds of drapery in the bystanders are rendered vivid in Doré's usual manner. The Gérome is a Japanese woman, in red crayon. Two of the Detailles consist of a "Cuirassier" and a "Soldier of the Prussian Guard;" both are excellent specimens of his work. In "The Serenade" Louis Leloir satirizes the last century with his clever brush in no very violent manner. Vibert appears with two pen-and-ink drawings, and an excellent water-color called "The Attorney." The expression of face in this figure is skillfully rendered, while the red velvet coat manages to frame the outlines of the body very artistically. There are two or more charcoals of Cottier, also, which might be termed "completed studies" or "careful off-hand sketches" of poultry. Among the few German pictures, present the "Pointer" No. 4, by Wolff, of Berlin, will bear examination. Rome furnishes examples of Filosa, Cortazzo, Bozzi, Rossi, Louis Jimenez, Cipriani, and Mariano Fortuny. We are afraid that the picture of Jimenez, "Thinking of Nothing," describes a good many of the Roman painters. With extraordinary dexterity of hand, and an admirable frankness in laying in color, they seem to be thinking of nothing whatever. But execution stands for so much in art that their pictures are very justly in demand. New-York has a few pictures to show from the late W. Craig, Walter Satterlee, and Victoria S. Lathrop.

YACHTING IN THE MEDITERRANEAN.

A SERIES OF RACES TO TAKE PLACE EARLY IN APRIL IN THE BAY OF NAPLES—THE PRIZES IN EACH CONTEST.

The Naples Regatta Club has projected a series of international and national races to take place early in the month of April, over the waters of the Bay of Naples. There are some very novel features in the programme, and it is intended to have contests between merchant vessels, small traders, and other craft on the waters of the Mediterranean. The first races are to take place on Wednesday, April 4. The opening race will be for pleasure craft, (schooners,) the property of members of yacht clubs of all nations. The prizes are a flag of honor and an object of art of the value of 5,000 Italian lire; the entrance fee is 200 lire. The course for this race is from the Naples Roads, through the small passage of Capri, along the southern coasts of the islands of Capri and Ischia, and returning by the channel between Procida, and Cape Miseno to the starting point, or vice versa, according to the wind. The second race will be for Italian merchant craft, (brigantines, briga, ships, barkentines, and barks,) upward of 300 tons, international register. The first prizes offered are a flag of honor and 10,000 Italian lire; the second vessel to receive 1,000 lire. The entrance fee is 100 lire. The course marked out is from the Naples Roads toward the east or west point, along the south side of the island of Capri, and return to the starting point.

The second series of races is to occur on Monday, April 9. The first contest of the day will be between yawls and cutters of 50 tons and upward, the property of members of yacht clubs of all nations. The course will be the same as that of the first race of the 4th of April. The prizes for the winner of the race are a flag of honor and a cup of the value of 2,500 Italian lire. The entrance fee is 200 lire. The second race is for national merchant craft, decked and lateen-rigged, of 50 tons and upward, international register. A flag of honor and 3,000 Italian lire are offered to the winner, and 500 lire to the second in the race. The course will be from the Naples Roads to and around the Varvece Rock off Massa, thence to Cape Miseno, where a stake-boat must be rounded, and returning to the starting-point, or vice versa, as may be ordered by the President of the Regatta Club. The third race of the day will be for small pleasure craft, (schooners and cutters) from 10 to 40 tons inclusive, belonging to members of recognized yacht clubs of any nation. The course will be the same as that of the preceding race. The winner will be given a flag of honor and a cup of the value of 1,000 lire. Thursday, April 12, will be the third and last day of the regatta, and three races will then take place. The first will be what is called an "Omnium Race" for pleasure boats, not decked, any model, not above 12 metres in length, the property of recognized yachtsmen. A flag of honor and a cup of the value of 5,000 lire will be presented to the winner. The course will be from Naples Roads, around the Varvece Rock off Massa, and back to the starting point. The final races of the regatta are for oarsmen. The first of these is for six-oared boats, belonging to yachts of all nations. The course is to be a straight one of 2,000 metres, and the prizes for the winner will be a flag of honor and 500 lire. The last race is for six-oared outriggers, owned by yachtmen, and manned by gentlemen—amateurs. The course is to be that of the previous race, and the prizes a flag of honor and a cup of the value of 500 lire.

It is anticipated that the regatta will be a great success, and that several American and English yachts will participate in the races. It is understood in this City that Mr. J. F. Loubat, who is now in European waters with his yacht, the Enchantress, will enter her for the regatta, and that the Sappho, now the property of Prince Scirra, of Italy, will also be a contestant.

GEN. SHERMAN ON WAR AND POLITICS.

The Rochester Union prints the following letter from Gen. Sherman, written in reply to an inquiry concerning what party he has acted with since the war:

HEAD-QUARTERS ARMY OF THE UNITED STATES,
WASHINGTON, D. C., Jan. 29, 1877.

Editor Union and Advertiser, Rochester, N. Y.:

Yours of Jan. 27th, with inclosure, is received. As near as I can learn, it would be unsafe to class Gen. Sherman as belonging to either of the great parties into which our countrymen are divided. He stands by the "constituted authorities," and has openly expressed his satisfaction that Congress had by law regulated the exact manner of ascertaining and declaring the Electoral vote, so as to escape the calamity of drifting upon the 14th of February with a certainty of a disagreement between the two houses of Congress.

Gen. Sherman has no conviction that wars will be less frequent in the future than in the past, or that his avocation is gone because Congress has in this instance evidenced wisdom and forbearance. The only object of war is peace; and military men, especially on this continent, have been eminently the advocates of peace. Nevertheless, as long as man is man, governed by passion, prejudice, and feeling quite as often as by reason and religion, wars are inevitable, and the military profession will be necessary and honorable among civilized peoples and nations. With great respect, truly your friend, W. T. SHERMAN, General.

NO GRAB-BAGS IN MAINE.

The Lewiston (Me.) Journal of Thursday evening says: "When the bill prohibiting pool-selling, lotteries, and other games or devices of chance was before the House of Representatives on Tuesday, a motion was made to amend it so as to allow churches to indulge in grab-bags, ring-cakes, and other 'benevolent devices' at their fairs. Mr. Pilsbury, of Lewiston, very properly objected to such exception, and said the churches asked for no such privileges. He wanted gambling of all kinds, however sugar-coated, cut up by the roots. The churches will say 'amen.' The proposition to amend was defeated, and the bill passed. Benevolent managers of fairs may hereafter dispense with grab-bags, ring-cakes, fish-ponds, and such little devices that feed the desire to try one's fortune in a lottery."

LOCAL MISCELLANY.

MR. ISAAC H. ALLEN, THE SECRETARY OF THE SECURITY LIFE COMPANY, GIVES BAIL—OUTLINE OF THE INDICTMENT IN HIS CASE.

Mr. Isaac H. Allen, the aged Secretary of the Security Life Insurance and Annuity Company, who has been indicted for perjury, appeared yesterday afternoon at the District Attorney's office, and gave bail to appear for trial. None of the other officers of the company who have been indicted have yet been arrested, but it is expected they will appear to-day of their own volition and give bonds to answer the indictments. Bench warrants have, it is understood, been issued by Judge Gildersleeve, and, should the officers not present themselves within a reasonable time, their arrest will no doubt be effected. The indictments against the President, Robert L. Case, the Secretary, Mr. Allen, and the Actuary, Robert L. Case, Jr., are for perjury, and that against the Vice President, Theodore R. Wetmore, is for embezzlement. The indictment against Mr. Allen, which is the only one made public, sets forth that on Feb. 19, 1876, and during more than a year next preceding that date, there was existing a certain corporation doing business in the City and County of New-York, and known and designated as the Security Life Insurance and Annuity Company, the same having been theretofore incorporated under the laws of the State of New-York; that on the date above mentioned Robert L. Case was the President, and Isaac H. Allen the Secretary of said corporation, and that on that date they came before Moses B. Maclay, a notary public in the City and County of New-York, and were sworn as to the truth of statements presented by them regarding the said company to the Insurance Department of this State, among them the following:

IV. ASSETS.

1 a—Cost value of real estate, exclusive of all incumbrances, as per schedule A.. $460,875 00
6 a—Cost value of bonds and stocks owned absolutely, as per schedule E..... 592,197 75
7—Cash in company's office..... 32,818 11
8—Cash deposited in bank..... 172,890 57

It is then further set forth "that the said Isaac H. Allen, in that behalf, knowingly, falsely, corruptly, wilfully, and maliciously did make oath, say, depose, and swear of and concerning, among other things, the assets of the said company at the close of the year 1875, in substance and to the effect following, that is to say, that on the 31st day of December, 1875, all the above designated assets were the absolute property of the said company."

The indictment closes as follows:

Whereas, In truth and in fact, the cost value of the real estate belonging to the said Security Life Insurance and Annuity Company, Dec. 31, 1875, was not $460,875, nor more than $300,000; and whereas, in truth and in fact, the cost value of the bonds and stocks owned absolutely by the said Security Life Insurance and Annuity Company was not $592,197 75, and was no more than $100,000; and whereas, in truth and in fact, the cash belonging to the said Security Life Insurance and Annuity Company in the company's office on Dec. 31, 1875, was not the sum of $32,818 11, nor more than $5,000; and whereas, in truth and in fact, the cash belonging to the said Security Life Insurance and Annuity Company was not $172,890 57, and was not more than $150,000. And the jurors upon their oath aforesaid, do say that the said Isaac H. Allen, at the City and County aforesaid, on the 19th day of February, in the year of our Lord 1876, before the said Moses B. Maclay, notary public as aforesaid, by his own act and consent, and of his most wicked and corrupt mind in manner and form aforesaid, falsely, knowingly, wickedly, willfully, maliciously, and corruptly did commit wilful perjury to the great displeasure of Almighty God, the evil example of others, and against the form of the statute in such case made and provided, and against the peace of the people of the State of New-York and their dignity."

Bail was fixed at $20,000 on the above indictment, and Stephen R. Post, of No. 265 Gates avenue, Brooklyn, and Henry Dickinson, of No. 786 De Kalb avenue, Brooklyn, became Mr. Allen's bondsmen, each justifying in the above amount. The parties were then conducted before Judge Gildersleeve, in the Court of General Sessions, and, after being sworn, the accused was allowed to depart.

THE RECEIVERSHIP OF THE CONTINENTAL LIFE.

The announcement of the resignation of Mr. John J. Anderson, as Receiver of the Continental Life Insurance Company, caused no little excitement in insurance circles yesterday, and speculation was rife as to the causes which prompted him to do so. The order to show cause why the prayer of Mr. Anderson's petition should not be granted is returnable to-day before Judge Pratt, in the Supreme Court, Brooklyn, when the new Receiver will doubtless be selected. Very many persons are mentioned as likely to succeed Mr. Anderson, among them Mr. William G. Best, formerly Receiver of the Mechanics' and Traders' Savings Institution, and Mr. E. L. Lawrence. It is the general impression among the parties in interest that the Insurance Department will name the new Receiver, but a reporter of THE TIMES learned yesterday that this is by no means likely, and the department will perhaps have no representation in the agreement to-day, for it is understood that the Attorney-General will, at an early day, apply for the appointment of a Receiver of the concern to wind up its affairs, on the ground that no stockholder can institute proceedings for the dissolution of a corporation incorporated by the State, except through the attorney of the State. This is a question that has never been brought before the courts of this State regarding life insurance companies, but the principle is a well settled one. There are two Referees now appointed to investigate the affairs of the Continental, and the probability is that before the litigation with regard to it is over very little of the assets will be left for the policy-holders.

THE METROPOLITAN FIRE COMPANY.

Justice Gilbert, in the Supreme Court, Brooklyn, made an order yesterday morning on petition of Charles E. Appleby, Receiver of the Metropolitan Insurance Company, which became bankrupt in November last, authorizing him to carry out an agreement with the Continental Insurance Company, by which the latter agrees to deliver its policies to the holders in the Metropolitan for the unexpired terms, on their delivering up their policies in the Metropolitan to be canceled; the Receiver to pay the Continental 50 per cent. of the unearned part of the premiums on such policies. The Receiver is further authorized to cancel policies, not surrendered, on such terms as he may see fit, and to reinsure such risks and policies as he may not cancel.

THE WESTCHESTER POOR-HOUSE.

The committee of the Board of Supervisors of Westchester County, of which Supervisor Read, of Yonkers, is chairman, yesterday continued its investigation at White Plains into the charges of misappropriation of the county supplies, and illtreatment of paupers, recently preferred against William H. Hammond, the keeper of the County Alms-house. Hammond's counsel placed on the stand several witnesses, among whom were a number of grocers and provision dealers, doing business in Tarrytown, who testified to having at various times sold groceries, hams, &c., to Mrs. Dominick, the defendant's daughter, while also on the boarding-house at Pleasantville. It is alleged by the prosecution that during the period referred to Hammond furnished the provisions for the maintenance of the boarding-house of which he was virtually the proprietor, from the supplies furnished by the county for the support of the paupers. The witnesses in support of their evidence, produced receipted bills of the purchases made by Mrs. Dominick. The committee adjourned until Tuesday next, when it is expected the investigation will be concluded.

INDICTED OFFICIALS ON TRIAL.

The members of the Hudson County Board of Chosen Freeholders who were indicted for malfeasance in office in connection with the purchase of a new Court-house site, were arraigned in court yesterday morning to plead to the indictment. The Freeholders present were: Director Halsted and Messrs. Farrier, Harper, Blackwell, McPhillips, Ginnochio, Johnson, Speer, Startup, Smith, Curran, and Cook. Freeholder Hall, who is also indicted, did not put in an appearance, being absent from the city. They all entered a plea of not guilty, and furnished bail for their appearance for trial. Hon. Leon Abbett, the leading counsel for the defense, moved to quash the indictment, but the court denied the motion. He then applied to have the case removed to the Supreme Court on certiorari, and the motion was set down for argument on Monday, when Attorney General Vanatta will oppose it.

THE KRICK PARRICIDE CASE.

The inquiry in the Krick parricide case was conducted yesterday at the Coroner's office by Coroner Woltman. The evidence adduced was similar to that already published. The jury rendered the following verdict:

"We find that Nicholas Krick came to his death from injuries of the head received at the hands of his son, George Krick, on the morning of the 14th of January, and we consider that the said George Krick was not justified in inflicting the said injuries."

The prisoner, a youth of 19 years, was recommitted to the Tombs in default of $3,000 bail.

THE BROOKLYN STRIKE.

A large force of Police is still stationed in the vicinity of the warehouses where men are working at the reduced rates (20 cents an hour) which the strikers refused to receive. No violence was offered yesterday to the new hands, but it will be necessary for several days yet to afford Police protection to the New-York men who have taken the places of the strikers. The report published in a New-York morning paper yesterday to the effect that a man named Lachman, who had been assaulted by the strikers, died of his injuries, is without foundation. Lachman was but slightly injured. George Ackerman, who was most seriously hurt, was able to leave the Long Island Hospital yesterday. The strike will probably end in a day or two.

THE SUFFOLK COUNTY MURDER.

FURTHER DETAILS OF THE CASE—THE INQUEST BEFORE CORONER PRESTON—VERDICT AGAINST NATHANIEL EVANS.

Thomas J. Poyntz, who was killed on Sunday night last at the house of Nathaniel Evans, near Thompson Station, in Suffolk County, Long Island, was 60 years of age, and had long resided at Bayshore, where he was favorably known. He leaves a wife and two daughters, who reside at Bayshore. He was employed by Daggett & Hendrickson, masons and builders, of that place. Evans, who is charged with killing him, is also a man about 60 years old. The murder seems, from the evidence elicited, to have been the result of a drunken spree, in which John Kennedy, a shoe-maker residing at Bayshore, also participated. Kennedy and Poyntz were drinking together on Saturday afternoon, and Kennedy slept at Poyntz's on Saturday night. The two went together on Sunday to William Borland's, who resides near Thompson Station. Borland keeps a low groggery in connection with a grocery store. Here they were joined by Evans, and the party had a high carousal, lasting late into the night. About 11 o'clock, Kennedy left Borland's very drunk, and, going to the house of Evans, went to bed with his clothes on. He was soon after followed by Poyntz, who went to bed with him in the same manner. This awakened Kennedy, but he had no conversation with Poyntz, and he soon went to sleep again. Kennedy was again awakened soon after, as he states, by Evans coming into the room. Evans told him that he could not stay there, as there was no room for him. Evans then went out, and Kennedy fell asleep. Again Kennedy was awakened by Mrs. Evans coming into the room. She exclaimed, after looking at the bed: "Oh, Mr. Poyntz is dead." There was a light in the room at the time. Kennedy then got up and satisfied himself that Poyntz was really dead, and said that he was much frightened. He staid about the house, however, until daylight, falling asleep again in the room where the dead man was. Mrs. Evans informed her husband and he went into the room to look at Poyntz. Evans has since alleged that they believed that Poyntz died from heart disease. Kennedy was much confused in his recollection of what occurred at Borland's, but was quite sure there had been no quarrel or difficulty. He was also positive that no one entered the sleeping room by the window.

After Coroner Preston was called to hold the inquest, Drs. Montrey and Vandewater made a post mortem examination. They found that a sharp cutting instrument had pierced the chest between the first and second ribs of the left side, passed through the aorta, and penetrated the tissues of the back. There was no bleeding outside, but a great deal inside. The man must have died almost instantly. The wound had evidently been made with a carpenter's or cabinet-maker's gouge, and as Evans is a cabinet-maker, suspicion naturally attached to him.

Besides Kennedy and the doctors, the Coroner examined Mrs. Evans, (who had very little to disclose except in corroboration of Kennedy's story,) William W. Borland, the grog-shop keeper, and one or two others. Borland said that Kennedy was noisy at his place, and he put him out, and Poyntz shook Kennedy and remonstrated with him, to keep him quiet, when Kennedy made a drunken threat to split both their heads.

The jury found that Poyntz came to his death by a sharp instrument, such as the one described, and at the hands of Evans, according to their belief. A warrant was at once issued by the Coroner for Evans, and he was taken into custody on Thursday night. He was to have had an examination before Coroner Preston at Amityville at 6 o'clock last evening. Upon his arrival at Amityville yesterday afternoon, however, he concluded to waive the formality of an examination, and concluded to go at once to the Riverhead Jail to wait the action of the Grand Jury. He was accordingly taken back to Bayshore, and thence to Riverhead last evening.

MAJOR GREEN'S PONY.

MAJOR AUGUSTUS P. GREEN CHARGES MR. W. E. TOBLER WITH FRAUD—A CASE WHICH PUZZLED JUSTICE FLAMMER.

Major Augustus P. Green, the proprietor of a riding-school, appeared before Justice Flammer at the Washington Place Police Court on Wednesday and asked for a summons for the appearance at court of Mr. W. E. Tobler, whom he accused of defrauding him in a horse transaction. Major Green said that on the 11th of January Tobler, with whom he was acquainted, called on him and said that Col. Delancey Kane desired to purchase a pony for his daughter, and he thought that a pony which he (the Major) had in his stable would just suit. The complainant said that he would take $125 for the pony, and any amount that Tobler could sell the animal for above that figure he could keep for his trouble. Tobler directed him to send the pony to Col. Kane's stable, and let it remain there for a few days for trial. The pony was sent as directed, and a few days after Green met Tobler, and asked about the pony, and was informed that Col. Kane had not had an opportunity of trying the animal. Major Green waited patiently for nearly two weeks, and then wrote a polite note to Col. Kane asking him if he intended to keep the pony. To his great surprise Col. Kane replied that he had purchased the pony, and had paid Tobler $125 for the animal. Major Green went in search of Tobler, who admitted that he had sold the pony to Col. Kane, and promised to settle with the Major as soon as he received the money. Green subsequently learned that Tobler had had Col. Kane's check for $125 cashed at Delmonico's previous to his interview with him, and believing that Tobler intended to defraud him, applied for a summons. Justice Flammer granted the application, and, in obedience to the summons, Mr. Tobler presented himself before the magistrate yesterday. Major Green made a statement, as given above, and Mr. Tobler claimed that he had purchased the pony from Green for $90, and had sold the animal to Col. Kane for $125. He therefore owed Green $90, which he would pay as soon as he collected some money due him. Green denied that he sold him the pony, but had sent the animal to Col. Kane's stable on the representations made by Tobler, and was willing to allow him to deduct 10 per cent. on the price of the pony, the usual commission. The statements of the accused and the complainant were so much at variance that the magistrate was rather puzzled to decide the case. Mr. Tobler was finally given until 9 o'clock this afternoon to make an amicable settlement with Major Green, and if he fails to do so, a complaint of fraud will be preferred against him. Tobler is said to be a frequent visitor at the Knickerbocker and other clubs.

ON TRIAL FOR MANSLAUGHTER.

Frederick Weinach was placed on trial in the Essex County, N. J., Court of Over and Terminer on an indictment charging him with manslaughter in having caused the death of Anthony Eggert, by pushing him from a stoop on Sunday night, Oct. 23, 1876. Eggert was in Weinach's saloon, in South Sixteenth street, Newark, that night, and became involved in a quarrel with some men there. In order, as he claims, to prevent a disturbance, he seized Eggert and threw him out. Eggert fell on the sidewalk and received a fracture of the skull, from which he died in about two hours. The case was still on when the court adjourned for the day.

A SUPPOSED SUICIDE.

County Physician Converse was notified yesterday of the sudden death of Mr. H. E. Speer, who resided in Vroeland street, Jersey City Heights. It is believed that he committed suicide, but it was impossible to get at the facts. Shortly before the fact of his death was announced, a pistol-shot was heard in the vicinity of his residence, and an officer who was sent there to investigate the matter found a wound in his forehead, which, however, might have been caused by a fall. Deceased failed in business a short time ago, and his wife died recently, both of which misfortunes caused him to have fits of melancholia. An official investigation of the case will be made.

REAL DEMOCRATIC ENERGY

SEEKING FOR TESTIMONY BUT NOT FOR TRUTH.

REAPPEARANCE OF THE DISGRACED MADDOX—HE PRODUCES A MUCH-TALKED-ABOUT LETTER—A REASONABLE REQUEST MADE BY GOV. WELLS DENIED BY DEMOCRATS—DAVID DUDLEY FIELD'S IDEA OF DECENCY AND FAIR PLAY—THE WITNESS LITTLEFIELD.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 3.—Before Mr. David Dudley Field's Committee, this morning, Mr. Maddox, the disgraced and perjured Treasury Agent, produced the much talked-of letter which Gov. Wells sent to Senator West. It shows that the former gentleman was afraid that the Democrats would succeed in their efforts at bribery. It was written with this object and with no other, but strange to say, Maddox, to whom it was intrusted, never delivered it. After this testimony had been given Gov. Wells, through, his counsel, Judge Wilson, asked that he might be allowed to testify. At the same time he presented a letter to the committee, in which he denied all the evidence which had been given by Maddox and Pickett, and stated that if he was allowed to do so he could disprove every statement made by them. The committee held an executive session to consider this request, and by a strict party vote, every Democrat voting in the negative, they declined to allow Wells to testify. He has been convicted of no wrong, but Mr. Tilden's friends will not accord to him the rights which a court of justice would not refuse to the most hardened criminal.

The Clerk Littlefield was before the Senate Committee this morning, and succeeded in proving to everybody's satisfaction that he was a gambler, an adventurer, and a bad character generally.

J. F. LITTLEFIELD'S TESTIMONY BEFORE SENATOR HOWE'S SUB-COMMITTEE—PORTRAIT OF A GENTLEMAN DRAWN BY HIMSELF.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 3.—The sub-committee of the Senate Committee on Privileges and Elections met this morning at 11 o'clock, Senator Howe presiding. The examination of J. F. Littlefield was continued, and in reply to questions by Senator Wadleigh, the witness testified that he is 26 years old; has been in New-Orleans since 1868; was on the Alliance Steam-ship Line as purser for two seasons; afterward went to Galveston in the ice business; went back to New-Orleans in 1871, not being engaged in business for six or eight months afterward, head-quarters being Spearing's livery stable; succeeded in getting on the roll of the Custom-house, with $83 per month salary; never did any work; was on the roll for five or six months working for the party, doing nothing, like the rest of them; always made Spearing's house his home; stayed in the front of the stable; helped him a little, but paid nothing for his board; was in the Custom-house until the election of 1872; frequented bar-rooms, &c., but did not spend the greater part of his time there; after the election of 1872, was appointed Clerk of the Returning Board through Col. Johnson, who had him appointed in the Custom-house; shortly afterward served as Secretary of the board until the adjournment of the Returning Board, about two weeks; was then appointed hay inspector by Gov. Kellogg; served as such until the Fall of 1875, about two years and a half; had no permanent occupation until he went on the board on the 9th of November; spent most of the time at Spearing's stables; had gambled in his life, but very little in the last year or two; kept house during the past year with a lady, but objected to giving her name; she was not his wife; she was an old acquaintance; witness hired the house in which they lived; paid $7 or $8 per month rent; had saved some hundreds of dollars when he left office; had considerable jewelry; the relations with the lady had not ceased when he left New-Orleans; she was not married; had no friends in New-Orleans; witness passed for her husband; she bore his name and she was always recognized as his wife; had two children by her; one was dead; the first one was born in 1873; witness had lived with the lady for five years; they lived lately on Chestnut street, in the Sixth District; had kept house in five different houses, three in the Sixth District; served on the Returning Board from the 9th of November to the 23d of December last; Gov. Wells made the suggestion to him of altering the returns on Sunday evening, Dec. 3; dined with the Returning Board that same evening at the time was in special charge of the Vernon returns. Three clerks were in the room when Gov. Wells made the suggestion, but do not think that they heard the conversation. Gov. Wells called witness to him, and putting his finger on polls Nos. 2 and 9 of the Electoral vote of Vernon Parish, said: "Littlefield, I want you to transpose these returns for the purpose of electing the Republican candidates." Witness made no answer, and the returns were left with him; sat at that same desk and transposed the votes but did not complete the work that night, but got through with the Electoral State, and part of the parochial returns; left the returns under some paper and found them there the next morning; told Eaton and Davis of this work; Eaton was drunk Sunday evening, as they all were, and promised to assist him, but being sober the next morning, refused; then told Woodward of his work; finished the work on Monday, put the return in with the others; the return was back on Tuesday marked "complied;" four or five days afterward Gov. Wells told witness to destroy it; made no reply; had conversed with Gov. Wells between the suggestion to alter and the order to destroy; Gov. Wells was going to take the true return away with him but did not, as witness' suggestion did not know whether or Gov. Wells destroyed the returns; after Wells had been before a Congressional committee witness had a talk with him, and he said he was worried because he had been questioned about the Vernon returns; said the matter ought to be fixed, and suggested that Davis make a copy of that return and then he would have them rejected, and would furnish the evidence on which they should be rejected himself; Davis wanted witness to assist him in making up this simulated return; we made this return purporting to be the original return; Wells asked us if we had found those three polls; all the conversations were in the Clerk's office; don't know whether the return we fabricated was signed; he asked us to find three polls; that would make up the returns which had been destroyed from Vernon Parish; this having been done, Davis asked Wells to furnish him with the evidence on which to throw them out; Wells asked us if we had selected the three the polls; we said "Yes;" Mr. Davis asked him how soon his evidence would be in to throw them out on; he said in a day or two, and took a memorandum of the matter and went off; Davis placed the forged returns with the other returns; Mr. Davis, Mr. McCormack, Mr. Eaton, and Mr. Woodward never had any acquaintance with Wells previous to going on that board; witness doesn't remember that he has ever conversed with any one about this matter, except Mr. Spearing, Mr. Eaton, and Mr. Collins; said Mr. Collins belongs somewhere in the West; witness has known him some years; he lived in Louisiana some time; he is an extensive land-owner; thinks the conversation with Collins was in Spearing's stable; Collins is about 65 years old; Collins said witness ought to bring the facts about the Vernon Parish forgeries to light for the sake of Spearing, who favored the Nicholls Government; Spearing complained of the Republican Government; said he had never been paid anything by any Republican, and had suffered pecuniarily through Republican rule, and he ought to better state of things would come from a change, in which Nicholls should be made Governor; when witness first took this Vernon return he carried it home and forgot all about it till it dropped out of his pocket a day or two after in putting on his coat at his house; on the morning; he put it in a drawer of the wardrobe; it remained there till the morning of the day witness left New-Orleans; when witness first told Spearing about the Vernon return it was in the presence of Gifford, and the latter thought it was a big thing, and wanted witness to come to Washington with him, where we could get $100,000 for the information; witness replied that he would have nothing to do with such a proposition; Gifford replied something about either having telegraphed to Washington, or his purpose to do so, in consequence of witness' communication; witness knows that Gifford did go to Washington; witness' last evening conversing this matter; witness saw the dispatch Gifford sent; it was to the effect that he had received information of great importance; it was sent to Senator Allison; witness thinks he saw Gifford the next day at Spearing's; Gifford showed witness a dispatch from Senator Allison to him, saying: "Consult Howe; he only is safe." Witness knew if Gifford said anything there about it, witness would never get out of New-Orleans alive if the Republicans knew it; has not talked with Gifford about it since; did afterward talk with Spearing about it on several occasions; Spearing wanted witness to allow him to use this information. It would, he said, be for his interest. It was after the talk with Gifford that witness had the talk with Collins. Witness had been on the board a week before Spearing knew of it; it was a week after the announcement of the vote when Spearing asked witness to aid him with information; the return was then at witness' house; Spearing said if the State was turned over to Packard, they would be all hanged, and witness with them; witness thought he he said it would prevent him [witness] from acting; witness did not have any talk on the subject with Gifford, after he showed the dispatch from Allison; Gifford swore that he never gave the information to any one, for witness told him that if he did his [witness'] life would not be worth a cent in New-Orleans; witness met Murphy in St. Louis and understood that Spearing was to meet him there; witness did not talk with Murphy there; he went to Springfield to consult with Gov. Palmer and Spearing; when he left Springfield it was not understood that he was to be a witness; he made up his mind to answer a subpœna if one came when he got to Boston; he did not meet any member of the Morrison Committee until he was called before them here; his family in the North were not aware of his marital relations in New-Orleans; witness was with Spearing in New-York, where they played billiards together and went to the theatre; witness did not know what business Spearing had there; Spearing served the subpœna on witness there, but he said he would not answer it, and was indignant at Spearing that this information was made public, after his promise to keep it secret. Witness stated to Gov. Palmer that he did not want to be a witness, and also to Murphy and Spearing. When the Sergeant at Arms went to the Riggs House and could not find witness, witness was in the next room, which adjoins Spearing's, in bed. He could not have answered the subpœna, for he was ill. He was subpœnaed when he was in bed.

Senator McDonald showed witness a paper, which he identified as the return of Vernon Parish. The polls 2 and 9 of 97 and 81 votes for the Democrats, he had changed to the Republicans, where there were no votes. His definite instructions were for the reason that there were three candidates, and he did not know which was the Republican candidate, and it was necessary for him to know which person was affected by the change of figures. Constitutional amendments, members of Congress, State officers, and parochial officers were all on the first page; witness changed through the State officers before Woodward assisted him. The witness, in answer to inquiries, supposed what he had previously stated concerning all the interviews between him and Mr. Wells about the Vermont returns. He repeated that the altered return was burned in the presence of witness and Wells, in the inner room of the board, and that either himself or Wells threw them into the fire; the witness and several clerks made up all the consolidated returns in a private office, none of which were ever seen by a Democratic clerk while they were being made; in making the fabricated return after the original had been destroyed, witness and Davis used the regular consolidated blank form; the object was to make it appear that the return had been rejected, rather than that the votes had been transferred; the original having been destroyed, it was necessary after Wells had been examined by the Congressional committee to have it appear that such a return was in existence and had been thrown out. Witness was shown a list showing a consolidated statement of the aberrations of the vote of the State of Louisiana which he identified as having been certified to by him; he recognized his handwriting; this return included Grant Parish, which, he was told, had been tabulated irregularly; that is, not by the regular Supervisors but by officers of the United States. The witness was shown another tabulated statement, which he recognized as having been made by McCormick. This tabulation contained the fabricated returns from Vernon Parish, which were thrown out on the evidence furnished by Gov. Wells.

The three polls fabricated aggregated 179 Democratic votes; there was one more vote in the fabricated list than in the original; Judge Davis was informed about it, and he said that was near enough; Davis was parish Judge at Baton Rouge; Wells filed his evidence on which the fabricated list was thrown out a few days after that list was promulgated; Davis furnished the evidence from Wells, saying it was about as good a thing as he ever saw; witness read the affidavits furnished by Wells and thought Davis was right; two of the affiants lived in Texas and the other at Baton Rouge; witness afterward copied the affidavits; they were sworn to before United States Commissioner D. J. M. A. Jewett, who was Secretary of the Republican Committee on Registration and Canvass, and assisted Blanchard in doing whatever figuring was necessary to be done; the clerks sent by the House Committee to New-Orleans were never permitted to examine any of the returns or tabulated statements in the office of the Returning Board; the fabricated statement was placed in among the other tabulated statements of the Returning Board, and was not signed; Gov. Wells proposed to witness to practice to see if he could counterfeit Flanagan's signature; witness refused to do it; nothing was said about counterfeiting the seal; witness had not seen that paper since; Spearing supported Hayes and Wheeler and the State Democratic ticket; this feeling was general among the business men; many business Republicans supported the Nicholls ticket; the heavy business interest was all that way; the Kellogg Government was acknowledged by the Republicans to be disastrous to the State and to the city; Collins is a large, heavy man, about 70 years old; Gifford is a young man; witness has no personal knowledge of what took place in New-Orleans after the 25th of December last; has not seen Collins since; the night Gifford sent the dispatch to Washington to Allison he was very much under the influence of liquor; Gifford claimed to be acquainted with Senator Allison; showed witness documentary evidence of such acquaintance; witness urged him not to send the dispatch, but he insisted, and did so; he said if witness would not come to Washington with him, he could go to the Treasury, or to the manager of the National Republican Party; thinks he mentioned the name of Chandler, and he would go at once to the Treasury and get $100,000 for the information; he was so drunk witness thinks he had to copy the dispatch for him; it was the next day Gifford got the reply from Senator Allison; witness frequently saw Gifford after that before leaving New-Orleans; Gifford never saw the fabricated return; witness never showed it to anybody till he gave it to Spearing, who received it under pledge never to use the name of witness, or compromise witness in any way in connection with it; it was a copy of the tabulation of the votes of each parish in Louisiana as they were received by the board from the Supervisors, that was furnished to Mr. Hale; Hale was present in the board room; Abel introduced witness to Hale at the request of the latter; witness and Woodward made the copy for Hale, who took it and left; afterward we discovered a mistake, and went with the original to Hale and corrected the error; Hale left New-Orleans a day or two after; this occurred on Thanksgiving Day, and Hale dined with Packard that day; Hale was a Republican visitor there; Gov. Palmer was there as a Democratic visitor, and he learned that Hale had been furnished with information which he had not got; Senator Sherman was present when we made the comparison and corrected the error in copy given to Hale. Gov. Palmer never asked to know why he had not the same courtesy as Hale had; witness declined to answer; he asked for a copy of the same document which had been given to Hale, and asked witness to come back at 8 o'clock and see him; witness promised, but did not go; Gov. Palmer stated to witness that if he had anything to do with this business he should pay for nothing; no Democrat ever offered witness any money or suggested pay to him in connection with these disclosures; certainly Gov. Palmer was the last person witness would ever think to go to for such a purpose; witness is well acquainted with the inside workings of the Republican Party in New-Orleans during the past four or five years; all the white Republicans there are on some rolls and drawing pay from the Government in some way; from the time we went as clerks to the Returning Board to the time the board organized, we were sealing up packages of returns as received and depositing them with the Auditor, who put them in his safe and gave us receipts for them; nearly all the parish returns were received and cared for in this way; the parish returns came in in separate envelopes, sealed up; all this work was done in the State-houses; only know of the affidavits sent in from hearsay; saw some of them written in Police stations; know nothing about the canvass of the Parish of Iberia; the statement of rejected polls was made up by Eaton; saw most of the reasons for the rejections; they were attached to the returns.

In answer to Mr. Oglesby, witness detailed his particular duties as a clerk to the Returning Board; took the aggregate of the parish returns, and made a compilation of them; that work was completed while the Sherman and Palmer committees were there; either witness or Davis discover that polls Nos. 1, 7, and 10 in Vernon Parish were equal to polls Nos. 2 and 9; no one but Davis and witness had anything to do with making up the fabricated returns.

In answer to Mr. Howe, witness said it was after the promulgation of the Electoral returns that Wells requested witness to make up a false return; it was not a week nearly after the announcements had been made; it took about one night to make the return; this was after we had abstracted the genuine return from the file; it was not abstracted, but taken at the order of Wells; we had no difficulty in making up the parish returns from the originals, except as to the two which had been destroyed, and these were made up by the original compilations in the office; witness proceeded to describe in detail the manner in which the Electoral votes from the several parishes were compiled. The fictitious return is a correct, or within two votes of being a correct, copy of the original return, which was destroyed. The witness was subjected to an hour's cross-examination by Mr. Howe to test the correctness of his statements and of his recollection as to the manner in which the fabricated return of Vernon Parish had been made up. Witness was unable to state why or when Wells asked for three polls that would make up the aggregate of polls Nos. 2 and 9, destroyed; he or Davis did not tell him at once that the 178 votes were to be found in polls Nos. 2 and 9, ready made to his hand. The session was then adjourned till Monday.

MR. FIELD'S WITNESS MADDOX RECALLED—LETTER PURPORTING TO BE FROM GOV. WELLS AND CONTAINING NOTHING OF IMPORTANCE READ TO THE COMMITTEE.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 3.—The Committee on the Powers, Privileges, and Duties of the House in Counting the Electoral Vote to-day examined Mr. Daniel W. Downs, of Wisconsin, who was an Elector on the Hayes and Wheeler ticket. He said that he did not think that as Examining Surgeon of the Pension Office he held such office of trust or profit as disqualified him from being an Elector under the provisions of the Constitution. He held the place of Surgeon when he was elected, and when he cast his vote in the College, and held the position now. He received no salary, but received a fee of $2 in each case of examination. No question of his eligibility was raised before the election.

Mr. Maddox was recalled and questioned by Mr. Field as follows: Have you the letters of which you have spoken? A.—I feel much indisposed this morning, and would therefore ask to be excused till Monday.

Mr. Field—Have you the letters? A.—I have.

Q.—Please produce them. The witness did so.

Q.—(Presenting one of the letters)—Is this the sealed letter addressed to Hon. J. R. West, Washington, D. C., to which you have referred? A.—Yes, it appears to be the same letter.

Q.—(Presenting the other letter)—Is this the other letter of which you have spoken? A. Yes, the one addressed to me.

Mr. Field then read the letter, as follows:

NEW-ORLEANS, Nov. 20, 1876.

To Mr. J. H. Maddox, New-Orleans:

DEAR SIR: Understanding the political condition of matters here from association with both political parties, and a friend of the President and a Government officer, would it not be considered a part of your —— to go at once to Washington with as little delay as possible and place before the President the condition and the pending dangers of the situation. Should you conclude upon prompt action in the premises, allow me to commend you to Senator West, who is my friend and with whom you will freely communicate. Yours very truly, J. MADISON WELLS.

The witness said that when he first alluded to these letters they were in New-Orleans, but had been received by him to-day, and in response to Mr. Field said that he was yesterday dismissed as Agent of the Internal Revenue Bureau.

At this point Senator West came into the room. When Mr. Field asked him to open the letter addressed to him, [Senator West.] Mr. West replied that he would open the letter, which he did, and read the contents as follows:

NEW-ORLEANS, La., Nov. 21, 1876.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I regret much not seeing you when here. I wanted to say much to you which would be at least imprudent to put upon paper. I trust, however, to meet you in Washington as soon as the canvass is over which is upon us. Our duties as Returning Officers have augmented the magnitude of the destiny of the two great parties—may I not say the nation? I fully comprehend the situation, as well as my duty to the great living General U. S. Grant, and let not my consent shall this oppressed people be governed by his paroled prisoners, aided by their white-livered cowards of the North. Let me, my esteemed Sir, warn you of the danger. Millions of money, no doubt, will be used in the interest of Tilden. Unless some counter-movement, it will be impossible for me or any other individual, to arrest its productive results. The gentleman presenting this letter is fully aware of the moves, and if you allow will communicate freely to our friends and act promptly, or results will be disastrous. A hint to the wise. Strictly private and confidential. Yours very truly,

J. MADISON WELLS.

To Hon. J. R. WEST, Washington, D. C.

Senator West permitted the committee to take a copy of the letter.

Mr. Maddox was examined by Mr. Lawrence who asked him whether anybody offered him $50,000 to report in favor of a cotton claim which he went to Louisiana to investigate. The witness replied that no direct offer was suggested to him to that effect; it was after the unfavorable report had been made by him that a person said that if he had made a different report he might have realised money by it. Having been asked to give the name of that person Mr. Maddox replied that he preferred not to do so, as the person did not make such an offer, but merely made the remark referred to after the unfavorable report had been submitted. The name of the person having the remark demanded by a majority of the committee, witness said it was Magrew; he did not know his Christian name, but would ascertain it by Monday.

Mr. Sparks—Was it Con. Magrew?

Witness—I think it was.

Mr. Sparks remarked that Magrew was connected with the St. Louis whisky frauds.

The committee then cleared the room for private consultation.

GOV. WELLS REFUSED A HEARING.

Gov. Wells sent a request to-day to the Committee on the Powers, Privileges, and Duties of the House in Counting the Electoral Vote, asking that he be allowed to give his testimony before them to-day, so that it could be placed before the public with that on the Louisiana case now pending before the Howe Committee of the Senate. The committee considered this request of Gov. Wells at a secret session this afternoon, and by a party vote refused to grant it, the five Democratic members of the committee voting to refuse, and the four Republican members voting to grant it. In the same vote the committee refused to allow the request of Gov. Wells to be entered on the record of their proceedings.

In the afternoon session Gov. Wells submitted to the committee the following letter:

The testimony of Joseph H. Maddox having been taken by the committee in reference to alleged conversations between him and myself, and certain letters having been produced, I most respectfully insist that my testimony in relation to these matters should be taken without delay; I feel it is due me that what I may desire to say on that subject should be known to the Committee immediately, and that the facts in relation to counting with those letters. There is nothing in connection with my conduct as a member of the Returning Board or as an individual, touching the subject under consideration, which I desire to withhold. On the contrary, I am anxious that the whole of these facts shall be known. I also desire to be interrogated in relation to the matter testified to by the witness Littlefield a few days since, and I most respectfully protest against further delay in the matter of my examination. J. MADISON WELLS.

The room was cleared for consultation, and it was decided to examine Mr. Wells on Monday morning.

Mr. Rutledge Lea was then examined. He testified to his having been elected a Presidential Elector in Iowa, but he had never met with the Electoral College, nor cast an Electoral vote, because he held the office of United States Commissioner of the United States Circuit Court in Iowa.

THE OREGON CASE—THE AUTHENTICITY OF DISPATCHES PROVED—TILDEN'S BARREL OF MONEY AGAIN.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 3.—In the Oregon Electoral investigation to-day, Mr. D. Spencer, Journal Clerk of the United States Senate, was called to give testimony as an expert relative to the handwriting on two cipher dispatches, one of which was addressed to W. T. Pelton, of New-York, and signed by J. H. N. Patrick, and the other addressed to Samuel J. Tilden, of New-York, signed "Gobble." Mr. Spencer testified that he thought the dispatches were written by the same person and with the same kind of ink. His reason for thinking that these dispatches were written by the same person was that many of the letters to be found in both were similar in shape, &c. James N. Fitzpatrick, a clerk in the office of the Secretary of the United States Senate, corroborated the testimony of Mr. Spencer. Mr. McLennan, of the Treasury Department, was called and corroborated the testimony of the two previous experts.

W. C. Griswold, an Oregon Democrat, corroborated the testimony of Mr. Bellinger, Chairman of the Oregon Democratic Committee, and of Senator Kelly, relative to the use of money by Democrats in connection with the Watts Electoral case; he stated that the reason the National Democratic Committee were called upon to furnish money for the purpose of contesting the issuing of a certificate of election to Dr. Watts was, because the Oregon Democrats were poorer than a church contribution box. The committee will finish taking testimony in this case on Monday next.

THE MISSISSIPPI ELECTION — DUPLICATE BALLOT-BOX KEYS SUPPLIED TO THE DEMOCRATIC JUDGES — THE SHOT-GUN POLICY—TESTIMONY OF A MAN WHO HAS SEEN ITS EFFECT.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 3.—The investigation into the conduct of the late election in Mississippi was continued before the Senate Committee on Privileges and Elections this morning. J. T. Lesseter, President of the Hinds County (Miss.) Board of Registers, who refused to testify before the committee yesterday, was recalled, and testified that there was a conference of the leading Democrats of Hinds County held at Raymond a short time before the election, at which it was proposed to furnish one of the Democratic Judges of Election at each polling-place in Hinds County with a duplicate key to the ballot-box at their respective polling-places; witness furnished about 15 of these duplicate keys to different men, all of whom were white men, and who, he thinks, were Democrats; no one called on him for a key; he does not remember the name of any man to whom he gave a key; he remembers that he slipped a small parcel into the vest pocket of one of the judges, remarking, as he did so, "Here is something which may be of use to you." Witness does not remember who this man was; he thought, however, that he was a man whom he [witness] could trust; in giving the keys to the judges, witness did not tell them what use was to be made of them; he thought they were all smart enough to find out how and for what to use them; witness did not use one of the keys, and does not know that any of the judges did. In answer to a question by Senator Teller, witness said: "I suppose my idea was that if there were too many Republican votes in a ballot-box the key was to open the box, that the Republican votes might be taken out, and Democratic votes be substituted in their stead." Witness admitted that the Republican judges of Election in Hines County were generally ignorant negroes, and that it was an easy matter to get them intoxicated on election day; he admitted, further, that duplicate keys to the ballot-boxes were furnished to one of the Democratic Judges in every polling precinct in Hines County. At this point the committee excused the witness until Monday.

Henry Outlaw, of Aberdeen, Munroe County, Miss., testified that all the political meetings which the colored Republicans attempted to hold in his county during the late campaign were broken up by armed Democrats; witness was at a meeting in Aberdeen during the month of September last, and at that meeting 17 colored men were shot; some of them were killed outright, and others were so seriously wounded that they have since died; witness stated that the Democrats had a practice of riding through Munroe County at night, taking colored men from their beds and whipping them, and that he and many of his race had slept out of doors for several nights previous to the late election to prevent being dragged from their homes and whipped; witness was wounded in the shoulder by a bullet at a political meeting in September last. Upon taking the witness-stand, Mr. Outlaw asked to be excused from testifying, for, he said, he would not dare to return home if he told the whole truth.

SENATOR ALLISON'S EXPLANATION.

Senator Allison states in relation to Littlefield's testimony to-day that the facts in regard to his correspondence with Gifford are as follows: Gifford being from Iowa, wrote (not telegraphed, as stated by Littlefield) that he had information of great importance to the Republican Party, and wished to come to Washington to communicate it; Gifford did not state the nature of the information, and, moreover, wrote that he had promised on his honor not to communicate it to the Senate Committee then in Louisiana; Allison showed this letter to his colleague, Senator Wright, and also to Senator Morton, Chairman of the Senate Committee on Privileges and Elections; they advised Mr. Allison to telegraph to Gifford to consult with Senator Howe, and Mr. Allison did so, saying to Gifford: "It would be safe to consult with Senator Howe." Senator Allison states that he did not telegraph, as stated by Littlefield, "Howe only is safe."

THE FEELING IN OHIO.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

COLUMBUS, Feb. 3.—Intense interest is felt here in the proceedings of the Electoral Commission, and every step in its deliberations is critically scanned. The work of the General Assembly lags because of the profound concern felt by members in the progress of events at Washington. The Republicans, generally, are very sanguine of a verdict in their favor, and will be deeply mortified and disappointed with any other result. The Democrats are not so hopeful, and generally anticipate a defeat. Business men of both parties look forward to a settlement either way with exaggerated expectations of its effect in relieving the stagnation of trade. In the midst of the general anxiety Gov. Hayes performs his official duties with his usual self-possession and quiet unconcern. During business hours his office is thronged with visitors, the larger portion of whom call, as they say, merely to pay their respects to the next President. The Governor receives them with cordiality, and talks of the Presidential situation as though he were an entire outsider, having no more interest therein than any other citizen.

The statement made in the course of the Senate debate on the Compromise bill, that in Ohio it has always been the settled and uncontested understanding, relative to the legislative canvass of the vote for Governor, that the presiding officer merely opened the certificates, and that the two houses of the Legislature together proceeded to count and canvass the votes, excites a good deal of remark here. The facts are just the reverse of the statement made. Throughout the entire history of the State, both under the old and present Constitution, the unvarying custom has been for the presiding officer to both open the certificates and count the votes, the two houses being merely witnesses of the proceedings. During the memorable contest between Ford and Weller, in 1849, this custom was vigorously, but unsuccessfully, contested by the Democrats, the result being that the presiding officer of the Senate counted the votes and declared the result in spite of riotous and revolutionary Democratic protest. The Constitutional questions which were raised during that controversy were almost exactly parallel to those which have been raised during the present national controversy.

THE GERMAN EMPIRE.

THE RESULTS OF THE RECENT ELECTIONS—ELEMENTS OF DISSATISFACTION — IS BISMARCK ABOUT TO RUSH INTO WAR?

LONDON, Feb. 3.—An afternoon paper, in a leading article, says: "The results of the German elections are deeply discouraging to the supporters of the Empire. Prince Bismarck will still be able to command a majority, but only by skillful manœuvring." The article discusses the elements of dissatisfaction, (Danish, Alsatian, Polish, Particularist, Ultramontane, and Socialist,) and concludes as follows: "During Prince Bismarck's life, the Progressists and National Liberals co-operating, he will be able to command a majority, but his successors may be unable to control the social forces which have acquired such dangerous intensity. We do not wish to suggest that Prince Bismarck is about to rush into war in consequence of the results of the elections, but these results introduce an element of immense peril into European politics. They cannot but intensify Prince Bismarck's desire to see Russia dragged into an Oriental war, and in any difficulty between Germany and France they will not make him desirous to find a peaceful solution. It is to be hoped that the prudence of the French Government will prevent any such difficulty, but those who watch the signs of the times cannot help watching anxiously the tone in which the journals of the two countries have recently been addressing each other. They have been talking as they did two years ago, when the German Colonels expected an immediate march on Paris."

NINE RAILROAD THIEVES ARRESTED.

LOS ANIMOS, Feb. 2.—The Kansas Pacific Railway Company, having been annoyed for some time past by robberies of goods from freight cars at Kit Carson, placed the matter in the hands of detectives, who succeeded in arresting at Carson nine of the thieves and recovering a large quantity of stolen goods. The plunder was secreted from Carson down the railroad for four miles, as well as two miles east. It was mostly buried in the ground, and consisted of miscellaneous goods, such as shoes, tea, coffee, lard, tobacco, powder, &c. The prisoners were brought to this place to-day, and each put under $1,000 bonds for his appearance.

DEFALCATION AND EMBEZZLEMENT.

POTTSVILLE, Feb. 3.—The jury in the case of Henry D. Boas, Secretary of the Citizens' Building and Loan Association of Shenandoah, rendered a verdict this afternoon of guilty. Boas was a defaulter for nearly $7,000. Joseph F. Dengler, ex-Cashier of the Pennsylvania National Bank of this city, who was convicted several days ago of embezzlement, was to-day sentenced to imprisonment for two years and two months in the Eastern Penitentiary. He embezzled about $8,000, of which $5,000 have been returned by his friends.

THE ELECTORAL TRIBUNAL.

THE DEMOCRATS STAKE THEIR CAUSE ON FLORIDA.

ARGUMENTS ON THE ADMISSIBILITY OF EVIDENCE REGARDING THE AUTHENTICATED RETURN OF THE STATE—TWO LEGAL POINTS ON WHICH THE DEMOCRATS RELY—JUDGE MATHEWS AND E. W. STOUGHTON FOR THE REPUBLICANS, AND MR. MERRICK AND JERE BLACK FOR THE DEMOCRATS.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 3.—The Democratic counsel indicated a disposition to-day to stake their whole cause upon the State of Florida. This is undoubtedly a wise determination, for if the Commission refuses to go behind the returns in the case of this State, it will refuse for all. Mr. Merrick, in behalf of the Democratic counsel, pointed out that there were two propositions with respect to going behind a duly-authenticated return of a State. One was, that the Federal Government could invalidate the return, or in other words, reject a vote on its own motion, without the consent of the State. This proposition Mr. Merrick dismissed rather hastily, but claimed that the second proposition was altogether different, and upon this the Democrats rely. It is that a State itself may undertake proceedings to invalidate the certificate of the Governor. After a State, of its own will, has impeached the Governor's certificate, the Federal Government may go behind it. This, then, is the Democratic position—that the new State Executive and the courts of Florida having, after the casting of the Electoral vote and its certification in due form by the proper authorities, made a great disturbance about its having been cast for Hayes and Wheeler, the Federal Government is given a right of investigation it would not possess if the Florida Executive had submitted peacefully to the lawful result and had made no effort to overthrow it. Mr. Merrick virtually admitted, or indeed claimed, that proceedings to invalidate the Governor's certificate must begin in the State, and thus gave up the Democratic case, except in Florida. With this proposition for the basis of the Democratic position, they build up an argument on the quo warranto proceedings and the action of the Legislature in ordering a new count, and claim that the State has done everything in her power to overturn the Hayes certificate, and has made it the duty of the Commission to complete that work. It becomes perfectly clear as the case advances that the entire hope of the Tilden party is in getting the Commission to investigate the election of the Florida Electors. This is the great question to which the Commission is now addressing itself, and upon which counsel are expending all their energies. The formal offer of evidence was made this morning, as soon as the Commission was called to order, by Charles O'Conor, and objection was made by Mr. Everts. It was apparent that counsel could not properly present arguments upon the propositions involved in an hour on each side, and the time was extended by the Commission to three hours for each with the privilege to counsel that the time might be divided among three counsel on each side. The order of the Commission was so drawn as to require the counsel to argue the entire case of the powers and jurisdiction of the Commission under the law and the Constitution, which involves, of course, the questions of evidence to be considered.

Mr. Merrick opened the argument for the Democrats, and was followed by Jere Black, the two occupying about an hour and a half. The opening for the Republicans was made in an hour's speech by Judge Mathews, and Mr. Stoughton spoke half an hour. Mr. Evarts has an hour and a half to close his side of the case on Monday, and it is understood that Charles O'Conor will close for the Democrats. Mr. Merrick, though of less reputation than any of his associates on the same side, made much the strongest presentation of their case up to the present time. The truth is that David Dudley Field is not fitted by temperament or training or character to present such a case before such a tribunal, and Jere Black is too old to be useful, his power as an advocate being something like a reminiscence rather than a present reality. Mr. Merrick has the advantage of a vigorous manhood and a respectable character, and in comparison with his older and more renowned associates is the more useful attorney. Charles O'Conor, too, gives to the Democratic case little strength, except what is added by his former reputation. Mr. Merrick claimed that the power of counting votes, granted by the Constitution, carries the power to determine what are votes, and that this determination is the first duty of the Commission. He called up the precedent of the rejection of the vote of Louisiana in 1873, and after discussing it concluded that it established the competence of evidence taken by a Congressional committee; also, that Congress can go behind the certificate of the Governor, and that a vote can be discarded. His most ingenious argument is noted in the beginning of this dispatch. Mr. Black added nothing but one or two jokes to the argument of Merrick. He complimented Mr. Merrick very highly, and said that any attempt of his own to add to what the latter had said would be like gilding refined gold.

The opening argument on the Republican side was the ablest that has yet been heard before the Commission. Mr. Evarts, of whom great things are expected, will find it difficult to construct a clearer and more logical argument, though he may surpass Judge Mathews in the graces of oratory. Mr. Mathews had never been heard by most of those who listened to him to-day, and it is remarkable that the expectations raised by his reputation were more than satisfied. He reviewed the series of acts by which Electors are appointed, showing that the final declaration by the Returning Board is in the completion of the appointment. That appointment completed, cannot be set aside, except in the interval of time between the final act of appointment and the day on which, under the law, the Electors perform their functions by casting their votes. Whether the appointment could in that interval be set aside Mr. Mathews did not discuss; but it certainly could not be revised after the functions of the Electoral office had been discharged. The authority of the State over the Electoral vote closes, when the Electors have voted. Whatever is done with the votes after that time is done in accordance with the Federal Constitution and Federal law. In respect to counting the votes the question is not who shall count them but how shall they be counted. The Commission had a certain discrimination, but it must be careful not to undertake a judicial examination such as is required in trying a writ of quo warranto, which involves going to the very bottom and ascertaining the number of legal votes cast. If the court attempted to sift the facts concerning the States submitted to them to the very bottom, how long a time would be required? He also showed that this power was not conferred upon Congress. The only question for the Commission to determine was, who were the de facto Electors in Florida on the 6th day of last December.

Mr. Stoughton spoke for half an hour, following Mr. Mathews, and emphasized with great clearness the point that the Florida Returning Board was the final authority established by the Legislature of Florida to declare who were the Electors, and the tribunal had no power to go behind the appointment by the State as declared by the provisions of State law. The Commission was appointed to count Electoral votes, and not to count the votes by which Electors were elected. At the close of Mr. Stoughton's argument the Commission adjourned.

PROCEEDINGS OF THE COMMISSION.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 3.—The Commission was called to order at 10:30 A. M., when the minutes of yesterday's proceedings were read and approved.

The Presiding Justice—Doubtless some question will arise as to the best mode of proceeding, and I will say, without speaking for the Commission, that it seems to me that counsel representing the objectors to certificate No. 1 should make their offers of proof in a concise, well-arranged form, and then that the counsel representing the objectors to the second certificate make their offers of proof, based of course, upon the condition that proof should be admitted, it being understood that objection may be made to all proofs by counsel representing objectors to certificate No. 1. In case there be a decision that proofs are admissible, then the Commission will have before it a case. If that course be adopted, the case will then be the certificates, the accompanying papers, the objections, and the offers of proof, upon which the counsel upon one side or the other will be heard.

Mr. O'Conor—Mr. President, and gentlemen of the Commission: I was first advised of the position in which this controversy stood, and the stage at which we had arrived, by a question somewhat suddenly propounded last evening before the adjournment. I have endeavored in the interval to adjust a statement as to what seemed to me desirable matter in the nature of evidences to be laid before this Commission—as distinct, succinct, brief, explanatory, and intelligible a statement as by the utmost effort I could make—having in view the act of Congress under which this Commission is acting, which seems to contemplate great promptitude, or at least great effort at celerity on the part of all concerned, so that the possibly numerous and difficult matters of investigation that may be presented may be gotten rid within the limit of time allowed by the circumstances, and the many observations that fell from the bench evince on the part of the honorable Commissioners a strong desire to second this object on the part of Congress, and to accelerate as much as possible the proceedings. I did not prepare that exactly in the form of the evidence, but, though that be not the form, that is the substance of what I have written; presently I will read it. There has not been time to make a fair copy of it, much less to have it printed.

Mr. Evarts—If it please the Commission, I desire to say a word. If we are to assume that the intimations of the presiding Justice are the order of the Commission as to the manner of conduct of the trial, it is the first knowledge that we have that that order will be the mode of this trial.

The Presiding Justice—It is not the order of the Commission, it is merely a suggestion from the whether certain votes offered for President and Vice President ought to be counted or not. Whether they ought or not depended upon the question whether they were true votes or votes falsely fabricated, not with any purpose to go behind the appointment of the Electors, but for the purpose of ascertaining what Electors had been appointed, and who were the true agents of the people for the purposes of casting the votes. The two houses proposed to use their verifying power, not to entertain an appeal from the decision of the State, but to ascertain what that decision was, which involved a question of fact. It was absolutely necessary that the conscience of the two houses should be informed concerning that proof which they were to decide upon, and accordingly they took a brief, legitimate, and proper mode of ascertaining what the truth was. They sent their committees and had testimony taken, and collected documents, and put the whole thing into proper form, and then came back and offered it to the two houses, and made it a part of the record of this case. And when you were appointed a substitute for them and became the keepers of their conscience, they required you to tell them what they ought to do, and make the decision, which, from the evidence before them, they ought to make. That evidence, I say, was put in, and the portion of which was taken by committees of the House of Representatives was laid before that house and raised a fierce struggle, and the filibustering of half a night to keep it out. The Vice President, the President of the Senate, the President of the two bodies handed this evidence over in bulk to be used here by the Commission, and you have seen it upon this table. Now I cannot conceive of anything more unjust than to talk about the necessity of our producing this evidence piecemeal, here a little and there a little, line upon line, in order that it may be submitted to the scrutiny of counsel who will apply to it those snapperdoses of nisi prius practice, which we would see you have seen upon Sessions, as if this case, instead of concerning the rights of the whole United States, was related only to the price of some sheep that a thief had stolen. If your honors suppose that this case is to be taken up de novo, and that everything that is done, and so much as has been made up in the case of the House before it came here, are to be thrown out and considered as a mere blank, why then of course you are to proceed—how? According to some approved rule of fair play and natural justice. And what is that? Why, the rule that prevails in Courts of Chancery, and not the artificial rules that are provided by the common law of England in cases of trial by jury. You know, surely, I need not say, that when any party files his bill he may put in along with that bill all the evidence that he has in his possession. There can be no objection to the evidence in a court of equity. There is no such thing known as objecting to the admissibility of evidence there. The defendant cannot object to it, because he is not in court at the time he files his bill. When the defendant puts in his answer he may accompany it with all the evidence, and if either of the parties need anything more, the court does exactly what the two parties have done in this case. They appoint their own agents to go out and take the evidence, and they have it produced. An examiner, a master in chancery, an auditor, or other assistant of the court, who takes evidence for the court is doing precisely for the court what these two committees have done for the two houses of Congress. There is no such thing when the evidence is taken as objecting to it, before it is made a part of the record. It is, as a matter of course, filed whenever it is offered by the party. He need not even come into court to get a special order of the Chancellor to do it. Now, the rule of precedence about admitting and rejecting evidence always throws the burden of proving that it ought to go out upon the parties who do not like to have it in. The question of materiality or relevancy, what its value and weight are, what provative force ought to be given to it by the court, is a question which, as one of the Judges said a moment ago, is always to be discussed upon a hearing and determined by the final decree of the Judge.

After further discussion it was moved by Mr. Justice Miller that the counsel upon each side be allowed two hours to argue the question raised by Mr. Evarts' objection to testimony as to whether any other testimony will be considered by the Commission than that which was laid before the two houses by the Vice President, or the President protem., of the Senate.

Mr. Commissioner Thurman—Suppose then the commission decide that further evidence ought to be considered, we would not have determined one thing as to what that further evidence should be, we would only have decided that evidence on the mere face of the papers presented by the President of the Senate to the two houses should be received, but we would not have taken a single step toward deciding what evidence should be received.

The motion of Judge Miller was finally modified so as to permit three hours on each side to discuss the question whether any evidence will be considered by the Commission that was not submitted to the two houses by the President of the Senate, and if so, what evidence can properly be considered; and it was further modified to include the question, What is the evidence now before the Commission? This motion was agreed to.

Mr. Commissioner Edmunds—I wish to suggest that the proposition of Judge Miller, as modified by the suggestion of Judge Thurman, covers the whole ground. The first point is whether any body—the two houses or this tribunal—has the power to go behind the formal certificate of the authorities, and, secondly, if so, by what species of evidence that may be sustained. It is claimed by Judge Black that it may be sustained by the ex parte nature of testimony taken by committees, &c., and reported to either of the houses. I suppose it is contended on the other side that it cannot.

THE DEMOCRATIC SIDE OF THE QUESTION.

At 12 o'clock the court took a recess to 12:30, when the Democratic side of the question was opened by Hon. R. T. Merrick, of Washington, who spoke as follows:

The decision of the honorable Commission this morning, as remarked by Mr. O'Conor, has somewhat embarrassed us in entering upon this important transaction. We came to court expecting to proceed directly to the Florida case and believing that the testimony that had been taken by the Committees of the Senate and House of Representatives upon the subject was regularly before the Commission as testimony in the case, without being liable to any objection on account of informality, and the ultimate admissibility of which would be considered by the court when it came finally to consider the main question in the cause, but that question is practically suspended for the present, and the counsel are required to argue the abstract proposition of law which is submitted to them in the paper read by the President of the Commission. That proposition of law, as I understand it, is: What generally are the powers of this Commission? What evidence now before the Commission, and what evidence is it competent, in addition to that now before you, for counsel to offer to introduce?

First, then, as to the power of the Commission. The organic act under which this Commission has been established provides as follows in regard to returns from States which have sent up duplicate or triplicate returns, when objections are made to those returns: "When objections are made to any certificate, vote, or paper from a State, all such certificates, votes, and papers so objected to, and all papers accompanying the same, together with such objections, shall be forthwith submitted to said Commission, which shall proceed to consider the same with the same power, if any, now possessed by the two houses acting separately or together, and by a majority of votes decide whether any and what votes from such States are the votes provided for by the Constitution of the United States, and how many and what persons were duly appointed Electors in such States, and may therein take into review such petitions, depositions, and other papers, if any, as shall by the Constitution and now existing law be competent and pertinent in such consideration." The language that I have read from the bill embraces a more succinct declaration of the powers of this Commission than any other portion of the bill, and is the only part, I believe, that has direct reference to the testimony before the Commission. Now, as to the regularity of the evidence which is already before you, I presume there can be no objection. A question was made in the two houses of Congress after the late Presidential election, early in their session, as to what votes, if any, should be counted from the States of Florida, Louisiana, South Carolina, and, I believe, Oregon. Upon that question a committee was appointed to take testimony. In reference to the case of Florida committees of the two houses respectively proceeded to that State, and took testimony in accordance, as I believe, with the uniform habit and custom adopted by committees representing Congress and discharging similar duties. That testimony, having been taken, was returned to the two houses of Congress, when objection was made to the counting of the votes from that State at the time they were opened by the President of the Senate, in the presence of the two houses, in pursuance of the order of the bill that I have read, received the certificates from that State, being three in number, with the papers accompanying those certificates, and the objections and evidence that has been taken by the committees of Congress in reference to the regularity and legality of that vote, were all transmitted to this Commission. I respectfully submit that that evidence is now before this Commission. Wherever Congress has assumed to exercise any power in reference to an inquiry into a disputed fact, it has uniformly appointed committees, or invested standing committees with the power of taking testimony in regard to that fact, and in this case the two houses respectively appointed their committees to take testimony in regard to the issue raised in reference to the vote of that State. That testimony has been transmitted by those houses in joint session to this Commission, which possesses and is to exercise all the power of those two houses in the premises. I therefore presume that there can be no question in reference to the regularity of that testimony, whatever question may be raised in reference to its admissibility under the issues which you are trying, and its effect upon those issues. I speak now of the mass of testimony generally that was laid upon this table, and I submit that it is now before the Commission, and, so far as I am advised, there is no other evidence with the exception of a very small piece of evidence in reference to the particular hour at which the writ of quo warranto was served upon what has been called the Hayes Electors, and with that exception stated in the paper read by Mr. O'Conor, I believe there is no question upon which the counsel for the objectors propose to offer any extrinsic evidence whatever. This evidence, which has been sent to the Commission by the two houses, is of this character. First, there is the vote that was inclosed in the certificates returned from the State of Florida. There were three certificates, the first being that accompanying the return of the votes of the Hayes Electors, the certificate of the Governor given to those Electors. The second certificate was accompanied by the certificate of the Secretary of State of Florida, and the third was accompanied by certain judicial reports which, under the express language of the organic act, were referred to this body for its consideration. The other testimony was extrinsic, to which I have already referred; taken by the committees, acting under the authority and in obedience to the mandate of Congress; and I may remark that when that committee took this testimony there was full opportunity given to all parties interested in the result of the inquiry to summon whatever witnesses they might desire to have examined, and to cross-examine all that were brought forward by the parties having adverse interests. The examination in chief was taken with the regularity of the rules of evidence, and a cross-examination was permitted, according to the broadest latitude of those rules. If we were required to repeat the experience of that committee under the authority of this Commission, and retake that evidence, there would probably be no witness called who was not before one or the other of those committees, and possibly no question would be propounded that was not propounded by one or the other, and the answer to which is not reported to and now before this honorable body. But as this Commission is invested with all powers of Congress under this law, the question recurs upon the materiality and the admissibility of the evidence without regard to form as to what are these powers.

I owe to your Honors an apology for undertaking to argue the question, for I did not come into court prepared to perform that duty, and in assuming to do it now, I merely submit myself to that subordination that prevails in the profession to obey the orders of my associate counsel. It was said in the opening statement made by the objectors upon the other side that this Commission possessed no other than a simple power to perform a ministerial duty; that it possessed no other than a power to enumerate the votes that the certificate of the Governor of the State was final and conclusive, and that there was no authority in the Commission, whatever might be the proof, to correct that certificate for mistake, or vacate it for fraud. Carrying out the position assumed by the objectors on the other side, it would follow that even upon the evidence of the Governor, Gov. Stearns, of Florida, Gov. Stearns himself had, subsequently to the date of the certificate, come before the two houses of Congress in sackcloth and ashes, come on behalf of his State to have some error in that certificate corrected, it could not be done. If he had come with penitential sorrow, confessing himself to have been guilty of fraud—(I am merely supposing a case)—however enormous, however patent that fraud might be, it would follow from the argument presented by the other side that that certificate was beyond the reach of proof, and that it was necessary to crystallize its falsehood into the shape of a practical fact. Now, in view of that position, taken by the other side, it becomes necessary to locate that paper and see what it is and whence it derives this extraordinary sanctity, infinitely holy, according to that theory, beyond any judicial record, and beyond any record that can be made hereafter to come in this case. By section 136, of the Revised Statutes, it is provided as follows: "It shall be the duty of the Executive of each State to cause three lists of the names of the Electors of each State to be made and certified, and to be delivered to the Electors on or before the day on which they are required on the preceding section to meet." There is nothing in this section declaring that that certificate shall be conclusive evidence of anything. There is nothing making it mandatory on the Governor to use that certificate; but if there had been, it would have been something in the section transcending the powers of Congress under the Constitution to put it there, for they could neither reach the Governor by process of law nor by process of enactment. It was not within the power of Congress to make it mandatory upon the Governor to issue that certificate; and if it was not within the power of Congress to make it mandatory upon the Executive of the State to issue that certificate, can it be possible that it was rather the power of Congress to say that the certificate, if issued, should be conclusive? For, if the certificate is conclusive when issued, it is therefore necessary testimony, in the absence of which there is no testimony, and unless it accompanies the vote the vote cannot be counted at all. If, then, Congress could not have required the Executive to give it, Congress could not—not even if it had been so disposed—declared that the certificate should be thus conclusive as only evidence of the election of the Electors of the several States, because the Constitution itself provides for an authentication of those Electors by an authentication by themselves. If to that Congress adds additional authentication, which it makes a condition precedent to the counting of the vote, it would be an act in violation of that provision of the Constitution, as well as in violation of the relations of the Federal and the State Governments.

There are two propositions, first, whether Congress can, on the question of an Electoral vote, institute an original inquiry and take testimony, going behind the certificate of the Governor of the State, and can invalidate that certificate on its motion, while the State still adheres to the regularity of the certificate. That is one question, and a very important one. But there is another question totally different from that, which is, whether the two Houses of Congress, commissioned to inquire into the Electoral vote, and to ascertain what votes will be counted, can receive evidence furnished by the State itself in reference to the certificate which its Governor may have given. There is a wide difference in the two cases. I respectfully submit that if the power does not exist in the two Houses of Congress, as a tribunal of original power, repeatedly to take testimony, going behind the certificate, then the power must exist in the State to correct its certificate or to impeach it for fraud or falsehood; otherwise we would be inevitably led to an accident or a mistake, and a Presidential election might turn upon a certificate which is known to the world to be an accident or a falsehood, or a fraud, and yet it could neither be impeached by the State that gave it nor interfered with by the Federal Government, but must be a substantial, living, and perpetual truth in the presence of conflicting evidence like it. I take it that is the second proposition in the case of Florida. The State herself, after the meeting of the Electors, ascertaining that the certificate given by Gov. Stearns was given either by mistake or fraud, and was founded on an irregular and illegal canvass of the votes, passed a law by her Legislature providing another canvass to be made. But she did not pass that law even until she had applied to her judicial tribunals to interpret the laws previously existing. Having applied to those tribunals to interpret the laws previously existing, and having in the mandamus case received from her tribunals of last resort an opinion giving a construction to previous existing laws, by which opinion it was apparent that the Returning Board had transcended its legal duties, and made a return that was erroneous under the law, the State Legislature, on the basis of that opinion, directed another canvass of the State to be made. When that canvass was made and returned to the Legislature the Legislature passed another act declaring that the parties to whom the certificates had been issued by Gov. Stearns were not elected, and specifying by legislative enactments who had been chosen as the agents of the State to speak its voice in the Electoral College. But she has gone further. A quo warranto was issued against those parties who assumed to exercise the Electoral office under the certificates issued by Gov. Stearns, and that quo warranto having come before her judicial tribunal, it was decided that the men who had received that certificate were not elected, but that other men were elected. Therefore, you have from that State this evidence; evidence from her Legislature; evidence from her Governor; evidence from her judicial tribunals, that the Electors to whose vote we object here were not the duly appointed Electors of the State of Florida. Through all departments of her Government Florida comes to the United States and begs that you—for you exercise that power now, and are invested in your own will protect the people from having her voice simulated by parties who were never appointed to speak in her behalf. Is not that competent evidence to go before the houses of Congress? If it is not, and if Congress itself cannot, in the exercise of its original power, go back and inquire into the manner of electing Electors, then you have placed the whole Government and administration of the United States in the power of any State Executive that may issue his certificate to a party never voted for at all, when the unanimous vote of the State was in favor of another party. And you are bound by it. You may take the whole population of Florida, and although they may never have voted for A or B, and though A and B may never have received a single vote, and although the vote may have been unanimous in favor of the other parties, the Governor may issue his certificate to A and B, and the certificate is conclusive that certificates for the next Electoral vote may be cast by parties who never received a single vote from any citizen of the United States. If this be law, then "who shall deliver us from the body of this death?" If it is not in the power of Congress it is not in the power of the State.

ANOTHER ARGUMENT BY MR. BLACK.

Mr. Jeremiah Black followed Mr. Merrick on the same side of the question, characterizing Mr. Merrick's statement of the case as admirable, and well calculated to impress the true nature of the case upon the Commission, and to give a full notice to gentlemen on the other side as to what his (Mr. Black's) side intended to rely upon. He said it would be only "gilding refined gold" for him to add anything to Mr. Merrick's statement. He insisted upon it that the evidence, being once in, or offered, or filed in the case, was to be treated as a court of equity treats evidence. The Commission was not required to give it any particular amount of force or weight in the final judgment; but the Commission was to look at it, and to determine the case on all the evidence before it. He would give the Commission an assurance, founded on some little experience, that a Judge or a lawyer never decided or spoke upon any subject much the worse for knowing a little about it before he did speak upon or judge it. [Laughter.] He would not refer to "Cuthy on Pleadings," "Daniels' Chancery Practice," or any of the books in which the rules of evidence are laid down, because he took it for granted that those were things on which he would be "speaking as to the wise," but he reminded the Commission of a quotation from Judge Marshall, made yesterday, to the effect that it was presumed that a Judge of the Supreme Court knew something. He hoped that no decision which the Commission would make would repel that presumption. [Laughter.] Indeed, he hoped that the presumption would be extended to the effect, not only that Judges of the Supreme Court knew something, but that members of the Senate and House of Representatives also knew something. [Laughter.] There had been much talk here about going behind the action of a State. He believed firmly in the sovereign power of a State to appoint any person as Elector, provided it was done in the manner prescribed by her Legislature, and he believed that after the appointment was made in that manner, no man had a right to go behind it and say that it was not an appointment fit to be made. Anybody (whether an officer of the State or an officer of the General Government) who undertook to set aside such an appointment as that would be guilty of usurpation of authority, and his act would be utterly void. Therefore, if the Governor of the State of Florida in this case, after the appointment of these Electors was made by the people, undertook to certify that they were not elected, and to put somebody else in their place, that act was utterly void, false, and fraudulent. They were not going behind the act of the State in this case. They were only going behind the fraudulent act of an officer of the State, whose act had no validity whatever in it. That was a question of evidence. Two sets of persons came here, each of them pretending to be the agent of the State of Florida, for the purpose of performing that important function of the State in the election of President and Vice President. It was the business of the two houses of Congress to count the votes. The point to which the Commission is to remember the argument of Mr. Merrick, and to let it sink in their hearts, and not to forget it, because it was God's truth. It was the word "votes" that gave the controlling meaning to the provision of the Constitution. The votes were to be counted—not a fraud, not a forgery. When they were told that the President of the Senate laid before the two houses a false paper that was absolutely a counterfeit, and that that was an end of it, and that no extraneous evidence could be produced for the purpose of showing that that paper was a forgery, the doctrine went too far. If that proposition were carried out to its logical conclusion, then it would follow that the two houses of Congress must simply receive what anybody chooses to fabricate and to say before them through the President of the Senate; and that neither the President of the Senate nor either of the houses, nor both of them together, could in anything in the matter, but to take what was given without inquiring into the genuineness of it at all. He saw, everybody saw, and he hoped nobody on the other side would attempt to deny, that the two houses of Congress have the verifying power which enables them to inquire whether a paper is a forgery or not; and if they have the right to inquire whether it is a counterfeit, they certainly have the right to inquire whether it is not invalidated by the fraudulent manner in which it was concocted. The work of the counterfeiter was as well entitled to be regarded as a truth as the mere spawn of a counterfeiter, gotten up for the purpose of cheating the people of the State and the people of the Union by overturning and overthrowing the great principle underlying the institutions of the country. He instanced the case of a patent issued by the Secretary of the Interior or the Land Office, the validity of which depended upon its confirmation by the Supreme Court, and where it was falsely recited that the court had delivered a judgment confirming it, when the record showed that the court had never done so, and he asked whether that patent was worth anything. It was good for nothing, because it was based upon a fact that was not true. In all cases of this kind false was fraudulent. The man who undertook to say that he certified to the election of these men, while at the time he did it there glared upon him from the record which lay before him the evidence that the fact was the other way, was a counterfeiter, and the paper issued by him was fraudulent. If it was fraudulent, was it not as void in law and as corrupt in morals as if it was a simple counterfeit made by somebody else than by the man who professed to sign it? He underetook to say that no man in this community would dare to deny that as a legal proposition in this case it was shown that the certificate was fraudulent. How was it shown? By producing the evidence, of which Gov. Stearns was as well aware as he (Mr. Black) was, which every man, woman, and child in this whole nation knew, or had reason to believe was true, viz.: That the other set of Electors had a decisive and clear majority of the votes that were received and counted at the polls. Gov. Stearns knew that, because it was recorded in every county in the State. The votes were collected together, and were filed in the office of the Secretary of the Commonwealth. That was one way in which the falsehood and the fraud was shown. But it was shown again by the evidence of an act of the Legislature, containing the solemn protest of the State against the cheat which her de facto Governor attempted to palm off on her and on the nation. It was shown again by the fact that the Governor of Florida, not two months ago, but the same officer, had revoked that fraud, declaring that the other parties and not those whose votes were now offered, had been elected and chosen and authorized exclusively to declare the vote of the State. Thus there was the evidence of two departments of the State Government against the fraud, but there was still more. The State had determined not to be cheated out of her vote, and had determined that she would ascertain the truth, in some undeniable form, by a proceeding, the correctness and truth of which could never be impeached. She, therefore, had taken those matters up by the throat, had dragged them into a court of justice, and there, in the presence of a competent tribunal, she had impleaded them, charged them with the offense, brought the other parties who were claimed to be her agents for the purpose, and set them face to face. That proofs had been produced on both sides, and there had been a solemn adjudication by that court of competent jurisdiction, that the persons who claimed to cast their votes for Hayes and Wheeler had no right or authority or power whatever to do that thing. It had come down as a rule of law that whenever a case has been decided by a court of competent jurisdiction, the determination of that court could be pleaded in bar as conclusive evidence of every fact and every matter of law that was, or could have been, brought into the controversy, and that neither in law nor in fact should that determination ever afterward, collaterally or directly, be drawn into controversy. Was not that rule? It had been so laid down by the Chief Justice in the Duchess of Kingston's case. It had been followed by every court in Christendom from that day to this. There was not in England or America one Judge or one lawyer who had ever undertaken to assert that the law was otherwise, nor had it ever been attempted to be clothed in any other words than the clear and felicitous language that was used by Chief Justice De Grey in that case. This doctrine had been applied over and over again to election returns as well as to all other things. It would be perfectly absurd to say that where a question arose that the title of a horse was in controversy, before a Justice of the Peace, the doctrine which made the title void for fraud was to be applied so far as to save the horse to the honest owner of it, and that it should not be applied to a case in which the rights of a whole nation were being struggled for. False returns had been made many times, false counts had been made at the polls, and false election officers had made false returns of the voters as they counted them, but no man had ever said to his knowledge that an election fraud ought to be held to be successful merely because it was put into the form of a law. That had never been said before except on two occasions; one of which was the famous New-Jersey case, and the other a case which occurred in Pennsylvania in 1838, when Mr. Porter was elected Governor of Pennsylvania by about 14,000 majority, and his election was sustained by the votes of the opposite party. They all know what had become of that attempt; it had resulted in the famous "Buckshot War." The parties opposed to Mr. Porter had intended to carry out their scheme at the expense of covering the whole Commonwealth with blood and ashes, and they would have done it, only that they could not get Gen. Patterson and his men to fire upon the people.

Mr. Black's time having expired he resumed his seat, and Mr. Merrick presented to the Commission a brief by Mr. Green, of New-Jersey, which he said was clear, and bore on the discussion of the question now before the Commission.

Mr. Black again arose to supply an omission that he had made, which was to state that evidence would be presented to show the ineligibility of one of the Hayes Electors on account of his being a United States officer at the time of his election.

Mr. Evarts (addressing Mr. Black,) said that a certain amount of evidence, not otherwise described than generally in argument, and which his side had never seen or inspected, had been argued upon as being already in on some chancery notion that it had been attached to something which had brought it here.

Mr. Black—That is in the record.

Mr. Evarts—What is it attached to?

Mr. Black—It is a part of the record in this case, made up by the House of Representatives before the case was sent over here.

Mr. Evarts—What is it attached to?

Mr. Black—Do you mean to ask me the bookbinder's question as to whether it is stitched?

Mr. Evarts—No; but to what is it attached?

Mr. Merrick—It is attached to the objection that was made when the vote was offered in the House as being the basis on which the objection was raised.

Mr. Evarts—The question is answered; it comes in.

THE REPUBLICAN SIDE OF THE CASE.

Mr. Stanley Mathews then arose to present the Republican side of the case. He said:

MR. PRESIDENT AND GENTLEMEN OF THE COMMISSION: Unused as I am to appearing before a tribunal so unprecedented and august as this, and quite unused to handling such high themes as form the subject of the jurisdiction of this Commission, I rise with the most unaffected diffidence to undertake the discharge of the duty which has been assigned me by my learned associates. And while I hope that I may say something which will assist the Commission in solving the questions that are submitted for argument, I shall be only happy, if after I take my seat, I shall be able to recollect that I have said nothing which I ought not to say. I take the first opportunity to correct a serious misapprehension on the part of the learned gentlemen who have acted as counsel in the opening of this question in regard to the position which they seem to assume as being already taken on our side. I refer to the conclusive effect which they suppose we attribute to the certificate of a Governor of a State accompanying the list of those whom he certifies as having been duly appointed Electors for that State. I am authorised to say by the gentlemen who are objectors to the second and third certificates, that that statement is an incorrect representation of their position, and I respectfully submit that, when I have sat down, no gentleman on the other side will understand our case differently. I may also take this immediate opportunity for relieving the apprehension of my very learned friend who spoke last, and who spoke so well in regard to the possible effect of excluding the consideration of what he has been pleased to call exhibits on evidence from the judgment of this tribunal. It is, Mr. President and gentlemen, a fortunate feature of your legal Constitution that you can make no mistake. It was a quaint saying of Selden in a little essay on Papal Councils, where he was treating of the doctrine that they were enlightened by the presence of the Holy Ghost, that he had generally found that the Spirit dwelt in the odd man, [laughter,] so that in the exercise of the constitutional function, whatever it may be, devolved by Congress upon this Commission in the count of the Electoral votes, effectual provision has been made against the defeat of the transaction by referring it to a tribunal which cannot be equally divided. And now, Mr. President and gentlemen of the Commission, allow me to state in very general terms, and yet as plainly as I may be able to accomplish it, the various propositions by which and through which we lead ourselves and hope to lead you to the conclusion for which we contend in reference to the point to which you as representatives of the Congressional jurisdiction may go in this inquiry and to the point where you must stop. What is the transaction? What is the subject of the general investigation? It is stated in its final result, the election of a President and Vice President of the United States. In what does that consist? It is not a single act, but a series of acts. The election of the two high officers is not a popular election either according to the spirit of the Constitution, the meaning of its framers, the interpretation of the generation which adopted it, or the practice under it. There is a select body of men in each State, who constitute the constitutional body who are to make that election, and I need not remind this tribunal that they have a right to make a selection as well as an election. It is altogether, in my judgment, a mistake to suppose that the Electoral bodies are delegates representing that State to the people or a State as agents to accomplish their will. They not only have the power in the sense of might, but they have authority, in the sense of right, to vote upon the day named for the person, who, in their judgment, ought to be, all things considered, the Chief Executive of the nation.

Mr. Mathews then went on to show that each State has the right to prescribe the mode in which the Electors shall be appointed, how they may be chosen by the Legislature, appointed by the Governor, or elected by the people, how arrangements are made for counting the vote by Returning Boards, &c., and for the issuance of the certificates by them to inquire whether a paper is a forgery or not; and if they have the right to inquire whether it is a counterfeit, they certainly have the right to inquire whether it is not invalidated by the fraudulent manner in which it was concocted. The work of the counterfeiter was as well entitled to be regarded as a truth as the mere spawn of a counterfeiter, gotten up for the purpose of cheating the people of the State and the people of the Union by overturning and overthrowing the great principle underlying the institutions of the country. He instanced the case of a patent issued by the Secretary of the Interior or the Land Office, the validity of which depended upon its confirmation by the Supreme Court, and where it was falsely recited that the court had delivered a judgment confirming it, when the record showed that the court had never done so, and he asked whether that patent was worth anything. It was good for nothing, because it was based upon a fact that was not true. In all cases of this kind false was fraudulent. The man who undertook to say that he certified to the election of these men, while at the time he did it there glared upon him from the record which lay before him the evidence that the fact was the other way, was a counterfeiter, and the paper issued by him was fraudulent. If it was fraudulent, was it not as void in law and as corrupt in morals as if it was a simple counterfeit made by somebody else than by the man who professed to sign it? He underetook to say that no man in this community would dare to deny that as a legal proposition in this case it was shown that the certificate was fraudulent. How was it shown? By producing the evidence, of which Gov. Stearns was as well aware as he (Mr. Black) was, which every man, woman, and child in this whole nation knew, or had reason to believe was true, viz.: That the other set of Electors had a decisive and clear majority of the votes that were received and counted at the polls. Gov. Stearns knew that, because it was recorded in every county in the State. The votes were collected together, and were filed in the office of the Secretary of the Commonwealth. That was one way in which the falsehood and the fraud was shown. But it was shown again by the evidence of an act of the Legislature, containing the solemn protest of the State against the cheat which her de facto Governor attempted to palm off on her and on the nation. It was shown again by the fact that the Governor of Florida, not two months ago, but the same officer, had revoked that fraud, declaring that the other parties and not those whose votes were now offered, had been elected and chosen and authorized exclusively to declare the vote of the State. Thus there was the evidence of two departments of the State Government against the fraud, but there was still more. The State had determined not to be cheated out of her vote, and had determined that she would ascertain the truth, in some undeniable form, by a proceeding, the correctness and truth of which could never be impeached. She, therefore, had taken those matters up by the throat, had dragged them into a court of justice, and there, in the presence of a competent tribunal, she had impleaded them, charged them with the offense, brought the other parties who were claimed to be her agents for the purpose, and set them face to face. That proofs had been produced on both sides, and there had been a solemn adjudication by that court of competent jurisdiction, that the persons who claimed to cast their votes for Hayes and Wheeler had no right or authority or power whatever to do that thing. It had come down as a rule of law that whenever a case has been decided by a court of competent jurisdiction, the determination of that court could be pleaded in bar as conclusive evidence of every fact and every matter of law that was, or could have been, brought into the controversy, and that neither in law nor in fact should that determination ever afterward, collaterally or directly, be drawn into controversy. Was not that rule? It had been so laid down by the Chief Justice in the Duchess of Kingston's case. It had been followed by every court in Christendom from that day to this. There was not in England or America one Judge or one lawyer who had ever undertaken to assert that the law was otherwise, nor had it ever been attempted to be clothed in any other words than the clear and felicitous language that was used by Chief Justice De Grey in that case. This doctrine had been applied over and over again to election returns as well as to all other things. It would be perfectly absurd to say that where a question arose that the title of a horse was in controversy, before a Justice of the Peace, the doctrine which made the title void for fraud was to be applied so far as to save the horse to the honest owner of it, and that it should not be applied to a case in which the rights of a whole nation were being struggled for. False returns had been made many times, false counts had been made at the polls, and false election officers had made false returns of the voters as they counted them, but no man had ever said to his knowledge that an election fraud ought to be held to be successful merely because it was put into the form of a law. That had never been said before except on two occasions; one of which was the famous New-Jersey case, and the other a case which occurred in Pennsylvania in 1838, when Mr. Porter was elected Governor of Pennsylvania by about 14,000 majority, and his election was sustained by the votes of the opposite party. They all know what had become of that attempt; it had resulted in the famous "Buckshot War." The parties opposed to Mr. Porter had intended to carry out their scheme at the expense of covering the whole Commonwealth with blood and ashes, and they would have done it, only that they could not get Gen. Patterson and his men to fire upon the people.

Mr. Black's time having expired he resumed his seat, and Mr. Merrick presented to the Commission a brief by Mr. Green, of New-Jersey, which he said was clear, and bore on the discussion of the question now before the Commission.

Mr. Black again arose to supply an omission that he had made, which was to state that evidence would be presented to show the ineligibility of one of the Hayes Electors on account of his being a United States officer at the time of his election.

Mr. Evarts (addressing Mr. Black,) said that a certain amount of evidence, not otherwise described than generally in argument, and which his side had never seen or inspected, had been argued upon as being already in on some chancery notion that it had been attached to something which had brought it here.

Mr. Black—That is in the record.

Mr. Evarts—What is it attached to?

Mr. Black—It is a part of the record in this case, made up by the House of Representatives before the case was sent over here.

Mr. Evarts—What is it attached to?

Mr. Black—Do you mean to ask me the bookbinder's question as to whether it is stitched?

Mr. Evarts—No; but to what is it attached?

Mr. Merrick—It is attached to the objection that was made when the vote was offered in the House as being the basis on which the objection was raised.

Mr. Evarts—The question is answered; it comes in.

THE REPUBLICAN SIDE OF THE CASE.

Mr. Stanley Mathews then arose to present the Republican side of the case. He said:

MR. PRESIDENT AND GENTLEMEN OF THE COMMISSION: Unused as I am to appearing before a tribunal so unprecedented and august as this, and quite unused to handling such high themes as form the subject of the jurisdiction of this Commission, I rise with the most unaffected diffidence to undertake the discharge of the duty which has been assigned me by my learned associates. And while I hope that I may say something which will assist the Commission in solving the questions that are submitted for argument, I shall be only happy, if after I take my seat, I shall be able to recollect that I have said nothing which I ought not to say. I take the first opportunity to correct a serious misapprehension on the part of the learned gentlemen who have acted as counsel in the opening of this question in regard to the position which they seem to assume as being already taken on our side. I refer to the conclusive effect which they suppose we attribute to the certificate of a Governor of a State accompanying the list of those whom he certifies as having been duly appointed Electors for that State. I am authorised to say by the gentlemen who are objectors to the second and third certificates, that that statement is an incorrect representation of their position, and I respectfully submit that, when I have sat down, no gentleman on the other side will understand our case differently. I may also take this immediate opportunity for relieving the apprehension of my very learned friend who spoke last, and who spoke so well in regard to the possible effect of excluding the consideration of what he has been pleased to call exhibits on evidence from the judgment of this tribunal. It is, Mr. President and gentlemen, a fortunate feature of your legal Constitution that you can make no mistake. It was a quaint saying of Selden in a little essay on Papal Councils, where he was treating of the doctrine that they were enlightened by the presence of the Holy Ghost, that he had generally found that the Spirit dwelt in the odd man, [laughter,] so that in the exercise of the constitutional function, whatever it may be, devolved by Congress upon this Commission in the count of the Electoral votes, effectual provision has been made against the defeat of the transaction by referring it to a tribunal which cannot be equally divided. And now, Mr. President and gentlemen of the Commission, allow me to state in very general terms, and yet as plainly as I may be able to accomplish it, the various propositions by which and through which we lead ourselves and hope to lead you to the conclusion for which we contend in reference to the point to which you as representatives of the Congressional jurisdiction may go in this inquiry and to the point where you must stop. What is the transaction? What is the subject of the general investigation? It is stated in its final result, the election of a President and Vice President of the United States. In what does that consist? It is not a single act, but a series of acts. The election of the two high officers is not a popular election either according to the spirit of the Constitution, the meaning of its framers, the interpretation of the generation which adopted it, or the practice under it. There is a select body of men in each State, who constitute the constitutional body who are to make that election, and I need not remind this tribunal that they have a right to make a selection as well as an election. It is altogether, in my judgment, a mistake to suppose that the Electoral bodies are delegates representing that State to the people or a State as agents to accomplish their will. They not only have the power in the sense of might, but they have authority, in the sense of right, to vote upon the day named for the person, who, in their judgment, ought to be, all things considered, the Chief Executive of the nation.

Mr. Mathews then went on to show that each State has the right to prescribe the mode in which the Electors shall be appointed, how they may be chosen by the Legislature, appointed by the Governor, or elected by the people, how arrangements are made for counting the vote by Returning Boards, &c., and for the issuance of the certificates by them to inquire whether a paper is a forgery or not; and if they have the right to inquire whether it is a counterfeit, they certainly have the right to inquire whether it is not invalidated by the fraudulent manner in which it was concocted. The work of the counterfeiter was as well entitled to be regarded as a truth as the mere spawn of a counterfeiter, gotten up for the purpose of cheating the people of the State and the people of the Union by overturning and overthrowing the great principle underlying the institutions of the country. He instanced the case of a patent issued by the Secretary of the Interior or the Land Office, the validity of which depended upon its confirmation by the Supreme Court, and where it was falsely recited that the court had delivered a judgment confirming it, when the record showed that the court had never done so, and he asked whether that patent was worth anything. It was good for nothing, because it was based upon a fact that was not true. In all cases of this kind false was fraudulent. The man who undertook to say that he certified to the election of these men, while at the time he did it there glared upon him from the record which lay before him the evidence that the fact was the other way, was a counterfeiter, and the paper issued by him was fraudulent. If it was fraudulent, was it not as void in law and as corrupt in morals as if it was a simple counterfeit made by somebody else than by the man who professed to sign it? He underetook to say that no man in this community would dare to deny that as a legal proposition in this case it was shown that the certificate was fraudulent. How was it shown? By producing the evidence, of which Gov. Stearns was as well aware as he (Mr. Black) was, which every man, woman, and child in this whole nation knew, or had reason to believe was true, viz.: That the other set of Electors had a decisive and clear majority of the votes that were received and counted at the polls. Gov. Stearns knew that, because it was recorded in every county in the State. The votes were collected together, and were filed in the office of the Secretary of the Commonwealth. That was one way in which the falsehood and the fraud was shown. But it was shown again by the evidence of an act of the Legislature, containing the solemn protest of the State against the cheat which her de facto Governor attempted to palm off on her and on the nation. It was shown again by the fact that the Governor of Florida, not two months ago, but the same officer, had revoked that fraud, declaring that the other parties and not those whose votes were now offered, had been elected and chosen and authorized exclusively to declare the vote of the State. Thus there was the evidence of two departments of the State Government against the fraud, but there was still more. KATE CRONIN'S DOWRY.

BY MRS. CASHEL HOEY.

CHAPTER I.

In the environs of the City of Cork, between that city and Queenstown, are many handsome country houses, standing in their own grounds, and commanding a fine prospect both landward and riverward. These residences, if they lack the peculiar trimness, the air of being especially cared for in every department, which mark country houses of a similar importance in England, have a pleasant physiognomy of their own, as distinctive as that of Irish landscapes or Irish equipages. The grounds are not strong in flower-beds, ribbon-gardening is almost unknown, the grass plats come up under the windows, the hedges are not trimmed as carefully as the whiskers of a dandy of half a century ago, and the foliage, profuse, richly, vividly green, is left pretty much to its own devices. The gardens are still of the old-fashioned order; one may find lavender and daphne, cabbage-roses, the common velvety ranunculus, which has come to be despised among the flaunting varieties that are not half so beautiful, and rich brown, almost black hollyhocks, in those delightful places. These country houses are, in many instances, the residences of merchants who have realized fortunes in the good City of Cork, and who have retired to enjoy them, not to a foreign country, but in the neighborhood of old friends and old associations.

Myrtle Hill, a handsome residence, situated on a bank of the "silver Lea," within a convenient distance of Cork, was one of those country houses which answer to the above description. Solid, substantial, comfortable, unpretending, something in its exterior aspect carried to the mind of the observer an impression that the dwellers in that house were good and happy people, home-loving and simple. The name, Myrtle Hill, was easily explained by a glance at the shrubberies, abounding in myrtle bushes, which formed a deep bay of evergreen shelter, with the house for its centre, and inclosed a wide space of bright green sward, wherein grew some fine trees, and which extended to the verge of the river, from which it was divided by a plantation with some pretty winding paths in it, and a well-sheltered Summer-house with a little railed pier, by whose side a boat lay moored in fine weather. The grounds were not extensive, and they were simply laid out. The garden, which was behind the house, was the chief pride and pleasure of the mistress of Myrtle Hill, and she held to the old fashions in flowers—the tints which were sung in verse when she was young, and the rich perfumes, which had "a good smell" of hope and youth and home about them.

The house and its grounds were handsome and conspicuous objects from the river, and any one inquiring about them would readily learn that they belonged to Mr. Redmond Sullivan, a Cork merchant, who was a prosperous and much-respected individual. If the curiosity of the inquirer should lead him to further questioning, he would probably be informed in addition that Mr. Redmond Sullivan had come of only "plain people," and was in fact a self-made man, and also that he was blessed with one fair daughter, his only child, a young lady who might, it was popularly believed, "have her pick" of a husband out of all the "quality" in the County Cork, and who, when she should have made up her mind about the "pick" in question, would bring the favored individual two thousand pounds "down," with expectation of the whole of her father's property on the death of both her parents. Considering that Redmond Sullivan was certainly a rich man—though probably his fortune was not exempt from the general exaggeration in which people indulge when they count up other people's money—two thousand pounds would probably strike the hearer as a small sum for him to endow an only daughter withal; but on this point Redmond Sullivan had his own notions, and very immovable they were, as the notions of self-made men may be generally observed to be, probably because in the process of this same self-making those notions have received the [illegible] was.

No woman could come to severe pecuniary grief who possessed two thousand pounds well secured, he would say; and no man who would not marry a girl for love would think it worth his while to marry her for two thousand pounds; and thus, he argued, a judicious parent, by making it known that he would give his daughter that amount, and no more, when she was about to make the tremendous experiment of marriage, might secure her from the worst of the risks which women must incur in this world. But, in addition to this notion of Redmond Sullivan's, and in curious contradiction with his apparently matter-of-fact and unromantic disposition, he cherished a secret conviction that there was something particularly lucky about the precise sum of two thousand pounds. The grounds on which he had formed this conviction involved a contradiction quite as flagrant as did the holding of it by the simple and practical-minded self-made man, and will be found to entitle the plain story which I have to tell to be called an "Irish" story in a double sense.

One Summer's day, a few years ago, the river Lea was all alive with boats, and the dwellers upon its banks were full of the excitement of a regatta. That amusement, than which nothing, not even chess or lawn-tennis, is more incomprehensible to the uninitiated, is immensely popular with the people of Cork; and the beautiful harbor of Queenstown presents a spectacle on the occasions of its resurrence which cannot fail to charm even those who are entirely ignorant of the mysteries of sailing, and become distracted by only attempting to distinguish one "craft" from another. It was the last day of the regatta. The weather had been beautiful; the performances of the boats had been most creditable, the enjoyment of the spectacle had been unmarred by any accident. It was fully expected that the ball which was to take place in the evening would be a wind-up worthy of the occasion. In short, every one was pronouncing the "regatta week" to have been a great success. Among those who had entered with most life and spirit into its pleasures, and who had contributed not a little to the enjoyment of them by her own particular friends, was Clare Sullivan, the only daughter of Redmond Sullivan, of Myrtle Hill.

Great, therefore, was the disappointment, and vehement the surprise of several young men, and even a few young ladies, when it became known that Clare Sullivan was not to be at the ball with which the festivities were to terminate, but that, in fact, she and her mother had returned to Myrtle House by railroad shortly after the fortune of the day had declared itself in the winning of the chief prize of the regatta by the beautiful yacht "Swan," the property of Sir William Tindal, an individual with whom my simple story does not further concern itself. It was hardly credible, indeed, and some of the young men maintained that it was also hardly honorable of Clare; for, had she not actually promised them dances? written their names down in her mother-of-pearl carnet with business-like accuracy, and had she not even charged those disappointed and bereft ones with arranging for suitable vis-à-vis for the "square" dances, which were held in but moderate favor at the County Cork balls. It was only too true, however, Clare Sullivan and her mother had returned to Myrtle Lodge, perhaps so the secret content of certain of the young ladies who were to stay for the ball, and whose carnets were not so full as Clare's when she had clicked the clasp of the bauble that afternoon with a pretty air of harmless triumph, and a little cry of "complet," as near to the tone of a French omnibus conducteur as her sweet voice could contrive to make it. Clare spoke excellent French with a charming accent, and her own language with a very fair one; for her father, the self-made man, who came of plain people, had among his notions certain fixed ones concerning the value of education as the best set-off to a pretty face, and had spared no pains and no money in bestowing that good gift upon his only child. She had had the best teachers whom money could procure for her, at her father's house—nothing would have induced her parents to part with Clare—and in all the higher and more truly important branches of education the precepts and the example of her mother, a woman of exemplary life, gentle and winning manners, and refinement of mind—which is by no means incompatible with the "plainness" of ancestry, birth, and bringing-up, which Mrs. Sullivan and her husband had not the slightest inclination either to ignore or to forget. The result of this system was perfectly satisfactory to the proud and happy parents, and any one who could have peeped into the railway carriage in which sat Clare Sullivan, nestling caressingly beside her mother, during their brief journey—for they were alone in the compartment—must have acknowledged that if looks were to be trusted as an index to character, they had every right to be content.

Clare Sullivan was just eighteen, and a perfect type of the "Irish" beauty, which is more frequently described than seen. In her face bloom and brightness were less conspicuous than freshness and sensitiveness of expression, and grace and intellectuality of form. She was not beautiful in the sense of complete regularity of features. The poet—I forget his name—must have had some such face, form, and manner as hers in his fancy when he wrote:

"She was not very beautiful, if it be beauty's test
And she did not look bewitchingly, if witchery it be
To have a forehead and a cheek transparent as the sea.
The fashion of her gracefulness was not a followed rule,
Her words were all peculiar, like the fairy's who spoke pearls,

But she was lovely enough—with her delicately fair skin, her rich dark hair, as nearly black as hair so fine of texture ever is; and her large, deep gray eyes, which had a mingling modesty and firmness in their glance that well represented the soul behind them—to fill the hearts of her parents with pride and hope, and the heart of her lover with rejoicing, when it should come to Clare's turn to have a lover. There were many sage prophecies rife among the people in that part of the world that that time would soon come; and Clare's admirers among the grave married folks held that the girl's only difficulty would be that of selection—a sentiment of which some elderly young ladies had been known to disapprove, as tending, by the nurturing of her vanity, to the "spoiling" of Clare. All things considered, as few spiteful speeches were made about Clare Sullivan as had ever been called forth by any girl who was conspicuously prettier and more charming than the other girls in her sphere and neighborhood; still, she did not quite escape; and she is just laughing over one which had been made on her leaving Queenstown, as she and her mother are traveling toward Myrtle Hill. Miss Caroline Valence had met her at the station, and highly approved of her resolution not to remain for the ball.

"For you've really got a bad cold, my dear," said that young lady, whose partners had a provoking habit of asking Clare for dances, and only resorting to herself when they found that Clare had none to give. "And there's nothing so unbecoming, or so hard to hide, as red eyelids. I'm sure I'd always rather miss a ball than look a fright at it." Clare's eyelids were as smooth and as fair as magnolia blossoms, and she had said nothing about a cold.

"Poor Caroline," says Clare, and a smile, just tinged with regret, plays over her sweet sensitive lips. "She will be quite happy to-night, for I have provided for her being well looked after. The boys have promised she shall never sit out a dance if they can help it." The boys were cousins of Clare's. They were two brothers, both in love with her, but both conscious that it was of no use and no consequence; therefore they were friends with each other, and her devoted slaves.

"The poor boys!" said the mother, smiling too, and looking at Clare with the fondness which found it quite natural that everyone should be captivated by her darling daughter. "It's rather hard on them, and, indeed, it's rather hard on me, that you should have changed your mind so suddenly, and ordered me off. How do you know but that I am dreadfully disappointed about the ball too? I am very fond of balls, you know, and I don't believe you have the slightest consideration for my new cap and my moiré antique. This was to have been their second time of wearing."

"Not the slightest, dearest mother"—Clare's face looked so sweet and grave as the smile left it, that her mother thought she had never seen it so lovely before, and that there was something new in its loveliness—"I wanted to come away very much indeed, after the last night, and I knew you would come at a word from me, though I could not explain it until we should be alone."

"Of course, my darling, and now we are alone."

"Well, mamma"—she blushed, faltered, and putting her right arm round her mother's neck, drew her face down to her own smooth cheek—"do you, now do you think you would have danced at a ball the very evening of the day papa asked you to marry him and you said you would?"

"Oh, Clare! it's Henry Warburton."

"Yes, mother, it is. Are you not glad? Oh, I hoped you would be glad, and papa, too. You see, he had to stay for the ball because of the Yacht Club, and his boat, and all that; but I couldn't. Oh, mother, I know you like him. Do say I may marry him, and that you are glad."

Mrs. Sullivan's eyes filled with tears, and she held the girl close to her, with an almost fierce clasp. She was glad, she was happy; but the mother's heart in her quailed at the first warning of change, and of the overthrow of home which comes with even the best and happiest of marriages. The darling of her heart was no longer quite her own, and the little rift between the old life and the new had begun. In the momentary silence the history of years flitted through her memory.

"Mamma! mamma! surely you are glad?"

"I am indeed, my darling; but I am sorry, too. However, I am not going to think of that just now. I cannot say more than that I shall grudge you less to Henry Warburton than to any other man I ever saw."

"That's quite wonderful for you, mamma," said Clare, as she withdrew her arm from her mother's neck, and again nestled by her side, holding her hand, "and a great deal more than we expected, for he knows what a spoiled child I am."

"Not that," thought the mother, as she gazed at the daughter's face, so beautiful in its soft, sweet, maidenly, frank delight, "only a much-beloved one, for nothing could spoil you." But she said only, "Tell me all about it, darling."

"Yes, mamma, and you must tell papa, and make him be glad to see Henry when he comes to-morrow early."

And then Clare Sullivan related to her mother her own especial version of the old, old story, ever new; and the mother listened, while in her memory the echoes of such another story, told twenty-five years ago, blended with the tones of her child's voice. Clare had not nearly exhausted the subject when the station for Myrtle Hill was reached, and she let down the window-glass, exclaiming: "Our message was all right, mamma. Here is the pony-carriage, and Rover on the step wagging his tail nearly off, as if we had been away for a month."

CHAPTER II.

The course of true love has rarely furnished a more complete and striking example of the exception which proves the rule than in the case of the pair of lovers who engrossed the attention of the inmates of Myrtle Hill, and furnished a subject for discussion to a tolerably extensive circle. Perfectly smooth ran that bright stream, shining in the sunlight of youth, hope, and general approval. Redmond Sullivan and his wife had every reason to be satisfied with their son-in-law elect; and the general comments upon the "luck" which attended the Myrtle Hill people were entirely justified by the circumstances. Henry Warburton was an Englishman, and would doubtless wish to live in his own country. This was absolutely the only drawback to the pleasantness of the outlook. The "old people," as Redmond Sullivan called his wife and himself, but as nobody else called them, would have to part with their child, and they were no great travelers, so that they would probably see but little of her. The engagement was not many hours old, and, indeed, Henry Warburton's promised visit, "to-morrow, early," had not taken place, ere Clare's parents had talked over that aspect of the case, and the sacrifice which was to be demanded of them.

"We could not pull ourselves up by the roots, Kate," said Redmond Sullivan, and plant ourselves down over there; and even if we could, perhaps the young people would be better without us."

"They have a fairer start before them than we had," said his wife, musingly. "How times are changed! I wonder what I'd have thought of the things we shall be able to give Clare, and that won't seem of much account to her, God bless her!"

"No, not they. It will be a different story for her, God be praised, from what it was for us, when we came home to the house on the Quay."

"We were happy there, all the same." Mrs. Sullivan spoke thoughtfully, and a little sadly.

"Indeed, we were, Kate," asserted her husband, cheerily, "But the way the world thinks now, I doubt that the child would get on with what did very well for you and me. Anyhow, she won't have to try. I like this young fellow from the first. By the way, I wonder what he calls early?"

Mrs. Sullivan made no reply. Her thoughts had wandered, engrossing though the subject of conversation was, away from it to days and events long since past, and to which her mind had not reverted of late. For a moment it seemed as if she were about to utter some of those thoughts, but she changed her purpose, and kept silence, while her husband continued to talk of Clare and her prospects with good-humored vivacity.

The visit of his aspirant son-in-law was destined to convey to Mr. Sullivan satisfaction more complete than he had hoped for. Clare, though there were no reserves between her father and herself, kept shyly out of his way all the morning, and contrived to be at the far end of the garden when Mr. Warburton was announced. The two men presented a strong contrast in externals, for the self-made Irishman had nothing in his person to contradict the plainness of his origin. He was a short, stoutly-built man, with hair fast turning gray, a dark complexion, very bright eyes, full whiskers; an expression compounded of firmness of purpose and kindness of heart; manners which lacked elegance, but were too simple to be vulgar; a deep-toned voice; a very hearty laugh; a generally crumpled shirt-collar, and a necktie with an incurable propensity to come untied. Henry Warburton was tall, with a symmetrical and well set-up figure and a face just far enough on the near side of handsomeness to escape insipidity; his chief characteristic was an easy distinction; his manners and address were those of a man to whom the best of all that is to be seen or men and cities is familiar; and to this savoir faire and savoir vivre he added a happy complacency, a genial readiness to be amused, which rendered him exceedingly popular among the Irish society into which his love of yachting and boat-racing had in the first instance brought him, and which certain of the young ladies of the County Cork, who had never been in England in their lives, and had a capacity for talking nonsense, praised for being "so un-English." Henry Warburton had fallen in love with Clare Sullivan almost at first sight; and, though she would not yet have confessed so much, the impression had been mutual, and it had deepened with every one of the numerous opportunities of the meeting which a very gay Summer had afforded them. The announcement of their engagement would be received with general approbation, but without surprise.

Mrs. Sullivan was present at the interview between her husband and Henry Warburton, in which the latter set forth, modestly, but without any hesitation, his hopes, wishes, and circumstances, and then it was that the parents of his betrothed learned that he was perfectly free to live where he liked, and that he liked to live wherever Clare should choose. If she would only go on occasional trips with him in his yacht, which had hitherto reigned supreme in his affections, he would "settle down" as near to her parents as she liked. He had no ties, no duties which bound him to a residence in England; he was not of much social importance; his fortune was in money, not in land, and had been left to him by his father, a well-born man, indeed, but who had made it in one of the higher branches of trade. Mrs. Sullivan listened in almost complete silence to the conversation between her husband and the young man whom they had seen for the first time three months ago, and in whose hands their peace must henceforth be placed; listened, observed him, and approved.

When the topic of Clare's dowry was introduced by her father, a shade fell upon the serene gladness of the mother's face. Mr. Sullivan stated his intentions with perfect frankness; his daughter should have two thousand pounds "down" on her wedding day, but her father would not undertake to answer for anything more.

"If my wife survives me she will have everything I have to leave at her absolute disposal. It would have been the same had our other children lived."

Mr. Warburton expressed, in very suitable terms, his acquiescence in all that Mr. Sullivan proposed, and began to cast imploring looks at Mrs. Sullivan, while her husband glanced furtively at the black marble clock on the mantelpiece. Mrs. Sullivan rose and set open one side of the glass door near her, which gave upon the lawn.

"I think Clare is in the garden," she said.

"May I join her?"

Henry Warburton did'nt wait for the permission, but snatched up his hat and darted through the open doorway, followed by Redmond Sullivan's hearty laughter.

"Well, Kate, I must be off," said Mr. Sullivan, with all a man's impatience to be done with anything like a "scene." "Give the child my love, and my blessing, and good-bye until dinner time." He had his hand on the door, but he stopped short, and came nearer to his wife by a step or two.

"What is it, Kate?" he said. "You look disturbed. Have you any misgivings? Of course, in every case, it's a lottery, but I do think the child has drawn a prize."

"I was not thinking of him," she answered; "I was thinking of that money. It has come back to my mind so strongly since yesterday, and I had almost forgotten it. What became of it, Redmond, what became of it?"

"Heaven knows, my dear, I believe we never shall know. Put it out of your head, Kate, it's a long time since it made any matter to us, for our own sakes. Let us keep to the old agreement, and never talk of it more."

There was no reason why the engagement between Henry Warburton and Clare Sullivan should be a long one. The gentleman had no near relatives to consider, indeed, as nearly as such can ever be the case in this world, he had no one to please but himself. The lady had the hearty approbation of all her friends, and as it was arranged that the young pair should go on a honeymoon cruise in Henry Warburton's yacht, the Sea Eagle, and then return to Myrtle Hill, and look about them for a place at their leisure, there was no house-taking and furnishing to oblige them to defer their marriage. The matter of Clare's trousseau might now occupy undisputed its place in her attention and her mother's. Mr. Sullivan opened his eyes widely when his wife named to him the sum which she believed to be the very least for which Clare could be properly equipped for the rôle of a married woman. Not that he had any objection to giving the money for the purpose, but that he was again struck by the contrast between the present and the past.

"How many gowns had you when we were married, Kate?" he asked his wife one day, when she and Clare had finally named the list of articles, only a few of which native artists were to be allowed to provide, and Mr. Sullivan had been making inquiries, half puzzled, half amused, into its nature and extent. "Come, tell me; I'm sure you remember, and could describe every one of them."

"Oh yes! I could do that." The wife of twenty-five years standing looked up with an animated smile, like a girl's, upon her face. "I had a French merino, of good lasting color, two house dresses, and a fawn-colored silk. Surely you remember the fawn-colored silk, Redmond? Dear, how proud of it I was, and it had swan's-down round the neck and down the front; Clare wore it out for her first polisse."

"And very well you looked in it. It the child looks half so well in all her finery, she may be proud of herself."

Mrs. Sullivan smiled absently. She scarcely heard her husband's blunt compliment; her memory was full of the past of her child's life; she saw her as an infant once more, as a little toddling creature, with a child's instinctive love of dress, clad in the remains of the fawn-colored silk. And now, in a short time Clare would be quite her own child no longer; she would not be able any more to come between the girl who had been the idol of the house and any of the real troubles of life. Thoughts of this kind were always lurking in the mother's mind, happy as she was in the prospect before her child, and why they should come so prominently into the foreground just because she was writing out a list of clothes, she did not understand, but so it was.

"What about the wedding-dress?" asked Mr. Sullivan; "will Clare condescend to wear native manufacture, or is it to come from London or Paris?"

"And what's it to be? Tabbinet?"

Mrs. Sullivan laughed. "I don't think you would understand the description, if I told you all about it. But here's a sketch of it." She took from under the lid of her desk a print from a fashion book, which represented a happily impossible young lady with a preposterous waist, in a white satin gown and a long veil, simpering over an ivory-bound prayer-book.

Mr. Sullivan looked at the print, pushed out his under lip, and said, "It's a comfort to know that, let the gown and bonnet people do their worst, they can never make our Clare look like that!"

With which sympathetic speech Mr. Sullivan took his departure.

The days wore themselves away, and the bustle of pleasant preparation went on at Myrtle Hill. Henry Warburton was a very easy-going, good-natured man, and, provided that he had Clare's uninterrupted society for two or three hours of each day, he did not grumble, after the fashion of most bridegrooms elect, at her being engrossed by all sorts of people and things during the remainder of the time. Besides, had he not to be perpetually running down to the harbor to visit the "Sea Eagle," and to inspect the arrangements which were being made on board that beautiful and beloved boat for the accommodation of its fair mistress. Everything went well with the young people, everybody was pleased; and even Miss Caroline Valence was reconciled to the fact that the prize of the season had been carried off by Clare Sullivan. "That is a sort of thing that cannot occur twice," she remarked to herself; "and though they are to live here, and she will be going out a great deal, no doubt, still, as we have not quite adopted English manners and morals in the County Cork, the young married women don't get all the attention, and all the partners here. Besides, the Warburtons will give parties."

It was within three days of the wedding, and Clare and her mother were alone. Mr. Sullivan and his son-in-law elect had gone to a "man's party," and the mother and daughter felt, without saying it to each other, that that was the last evening in the lives of both that they should have to pass together with their old relations still unchanged. To-morrow the house would be full of people; for the wedding was to be a gay one, and Clare's cousins (the bridesmaids) were coming from Dublin.

Mrs. Sullivan and her daughter were sitting in the pretty room which had been specially fitted up for Clare, and which contained all the little treasures which a girl accumulates within her own sanctum. The room was to remain unchanged until her return. She had placed her mother in the easy-chair, covered with pink and gray crétonne, and turned it toward the wide window and balcony, full of flower-pots and bird-cages, and had placed herself on a footstool by her mother's side. The evening was very warm and beautiful, and the twilight was sweet and solemn. The girl had been talking gaily to her mother for some time, but she became thoughtful, and leaned her head on the arm of the chair, her hair touching Mrs. Sullivan's hand, in silence. Her mother was also silent, and her gaze, directed to the prospect beyond the house, had little consciousness of the scene in it.

"Mamma," said Clare at length, "I wish you would tell me about your wedding. You never have told me anything about it. Was it a very pretting wedding? Was it gay? What did you wear? I suppose even wedding dresses were different in those days."

She had raised her head, and was looking at her mother.

"Do tell me all about it; you can't think how much I should like to know; and this is the very best time for me to hear it. I really don't know anything about you when you were a girl, mamma, except that you were not so happy as I am, for you hadn't a mother. So tell me about yourself now."

Mrs. Sullivan looked down upon her daughter's eager face with a smile as she said, "My wedding was a very gay one, darling, but there were circumstances connected with it which brought me into a good deal of trouble at the time, and for long afterward, and I have never spoken of them of late years."

"Trouble, mamma! Had it anything to do with papa?"

"Nothing in the sense of unhappiness between us, darling; but the trouble came heavily upon him. I will tell you the story, for it will make you understand how much reason we have to love and respect your father. Get me a shawl; we will not close the windows, or light the candles."

"It is just the time for a story," said Clare, as she carefully placed a shawl round her mother's shoulders, and then resumed her seat by her side; "and I don't mind there being trouble in it, since it is over long ago."

CHAPTER III.

"When I was a girl," began Mrs. Sullivan, "my father, my brother, who was older than I, and could remember our mother, lived in an old house on the road between Cork and Blarney. It was a roomy house, but very dull, and the garden had high walls round it. The house was pulled down fifteen years ago, and Mr. Monroe bought the land; there is not any likeness at all between the place now and what it was. We lived a very quiet life there, until my brother took it into his head to go to sea, and could not be persuaded out of it by our father or by me, or by one of the friends who tried to persuade him. It was a pity; he had had a good education for those times, and his father idolized him. He was never half so fond of me, though he was a good father to me also. The first trouble I can remember was when Terence left us, to make a long voyage to China. After he was gone, my father and I were more together, and I began to understand more about his affairs, and to know that he was not very well off. Not that I wanted anything I had not, or that we were not comfortable at home; but I could see that my father was what we used to call "bothered" about things, and that he was rather helpless in his ways. He was a most amiable man; I never knew a gentler or kindor heart than your grandfather's, but he was not quick or ready; he had none of the practical ability which your father possesses, none of that decided manner which makes one feel that he has thoroughly considered a matter, and made up his mind about it on the soundest grounds. My father had a hesitating way with him, as if he had gone astray in life, and he had a puzzled look in his face. How often when you have been doing your lessons, and not getting on with them——"

"I remember," softly interrupted Clare, nodding her head with emphatic satisfaction in the reflection that the day of doing sums was over.

"How often I have looked at you, and seen a likeness to him in your face. He was in business in Cork, senior partner too, and I believe it ought to have been a good business; but it never was, and I doubt whether any business which my dear father might have had to conduct would ever have been a good one. There are men who can't succeed, he was one of them; but they are sometimes more lovable and better loved than those with whom everything goes well, who climb the ladder of fortune quickly, perhaps because the pushed aside lacks the hard self-assertion of the pusher. If ever a man wanted a sensible wife, that man was my father; but I don't think it ever occurred to him as a possibility to marry again. I suppose no girl could have been happier than I was with my father, but my home was not at all like the home we have been able to give you, at least, for as long as you can remember. It was not very comfortable or orderly, but I did not miss what I had never known, and I had plenty of amusement, and very high spirits. I was as lively as you are when I was your age, and I believe I was almost as well-looking."

"Why, mamma," exclaimed Clare, "you know you were a thousand times better looking! Papa has often told me you were the prettiest girl in Cork."

"Ah, papa! Yes, he thought so, but then he is not an impartial witness. However, never mind that. I was a pretty girl, and a very merry and happy girl, when I met your papa first."

"Was he really your first, quite, your very first love?" Clare asked her mother, with a sly, demure smile. "Like—like Henry, you know."

"Wait, Clare, let me tell you my story. We have wandered off on the unprofitable point of my good looks. I was telling you about my high spirits and general content with things as they were. I was very fond of dancing, and there was a great deal of dancing in those days; parties were not so grand and so expensive as they are now, but they were more numerous, and we certainly did not enjoy them less when a white muslin gown over a calico slip, and a pink or blue sash, formed quite a grand evening dress. What would you say to that, Clare?"

"I should not like it at all, mother," said Clare, with entire frankness, "but I suppose if everybody else wore the same I should not much mind."

"There's a great deal in that. My father used to allow me to ask anybody I pleased to our house, and never refused to take me anywhere. We had a numerous acquaintance, and the only grievance of my life was that we lived in the country, and not in the town. I had to trust to my friends who had jaunting-cars to take me about to any distances beyond a walk. There was a regular car, which brought my father to his business every day; it accommodated four gentlemen, who paid so much yearly; but there was no place to spare for me. I remember well how I used to make my evening dress into a parcel, and send it down in the well of the car to one of the houses of my party-giving friends, and walk into town in the evening, just as ready to 'dance all night till the broad daylight' as any of your black pets in your Christy collection. I need not tell you, then, that I was not at all sorry when my father told me—it was the day before my eighteenth birthday—that he had some idea of selling our house and moving into town. I knew there was something in it he did not like, for the puzzled look in his face was more marked than usual, and he told me presently that it might not look well, perhaps; that we were "better considered" by living out of the town, but he had an offer for the house, and so on—particulars I need not go into. There was good reason for the information—in fact, a large house over his offices; his business was a branch of the shipping trade—and he thought he had better go and live there. I was delighted beyond measure; it was the very best thing he could have proposed, and I was only impatient to make the move at once. It was not long delayed; but in the meantime an incident occurred which did not give me much concern at the time, but which had some bearing on the future of my story. There are people who say no woman ought to acknowledge that any man except her husband ever asked her to marry him; because no man proposes to a woman unless she has given him reason to believe that she means to accept him. This may be true as a general rule, but it had an exception in my case. I never was more surprised or less pleased in my life than when a certain Mr. James Downing, the son of a banker who was a very rich man, proposed to me at a party given by his mother. I had come into town, and was staying at a friend's house—it was my eighteenth birthday—and the party was quite an event. I enjoyed the dancing, as usual; but I was genuinely unaware that Mr. Downing was paying me more attention than usual, and when he detained me in a little conservatory at the back of the drawing-room, and asked me the important question as if there could not be the least doubt in the world about the answer which he was to receive, I was angry and frightened. At first he would not receive my answer as final, but when, under the influence of both fear and anger, which when combined form desperation, I made my meaning perfectly plain, he told me I was nothing but a heartless coquette, and had deliberately led him to make a tool of himself for the pleasure of triumphing over him, and that I might count upon his never forgetting the affront I had put upon him. I was roused by this to anger unmixed by any regret, and I told him that I cared as little for his threats as I cared for himself, and begged that henceforth he would not venture to claim acquaintance with me. You will wonder when I tell you, Clare, that this unmanly man carried the story of his proposal and my refusal of it to his mother, and to other friends of mine, and that I was severely blamed among them. His mother would have been desperately angry if I had married Mr. Downing, for whom she wanted a girl with a fortune, not poor Kate Cronin, with nothing but vague possibilities of a small dowry; but at the same time she was excessively indignant that poor Kate Cronin should have presumed to refuse her son. I heard a great deal about it at the time, and Mrs. Downing ceased to invite me to her parties; but I put the matter out of my mind, which was soon filled with another subject, for I was without this time that your papa and I first met."

"It was in a very prosaic way that the meeting came about, my dear. Your father was a clerk in the house of Matthewson & Joyce, and it was the junior partner who wanted to buy our house. Mr. Sullivan called to see my father with a letter from the junior partner, and my father was ill and could not see him. He sent me into the parlor with a message in answer to Mr. Joyce's letter, and—"

"And papa fell in love with you on the spot. Of course he did. He could not help it."

"I don't know about that. At all events, he brought a second message the next day, and a third the day after, and by the time the bargain for our house was concluded, and it was settled that we were to remove to Cork, I had learned a great deal about Redmond Sullivan, and especially that he stood very high in the estimation of Messrs. Matthewson & Joyce, who considered him a clever man of business, and who would, he believed, be not unwilling to take him into partnership, if he could bring a comparatively small sum of money into the business. That was the day of small things, and little did we ever think that the future could bring such good gifts to us. That future was a long way off, and between us and it there lay serious troubles. My father sold the house, and we removed to Cork. I was delighted with the change. We had brought with us all our old furniture and books, and the house on the Quay, over the offices, soon began to look quite homelike. But I found to my great surprise, that we were supposed to have come down in the world by the change, and that hints were abroad that my father's business was doing less well than ever, and that, in fact, there were troublous times ahead of him. A little inquiry enabled me to trace these reports to Mrs. Downing and her son, and I suffered from them almost as much as they could have desired me to suffer, for, though I knew little of business matters, I was aware that such rumors would injure my father's credit, and I blamed myself for them. If only I had not had the misfortune first to attract and then to offend Mr. Downing there would not have been those rumors. But, though I felt this annoyance keenly, it and every other soon gave way to the great happiness that was coming into my life; and it was destined also to be put entirely aside by a great sorrow. Within six months after my father and I came to live in Cork, your father and I were engaged to one another (with every prospect of a long engagement before us,) and about two months after I was of my brother's death. He had done well in his chosen career, and had been home three times. He died of fever at Shanghai, and my father, though he bore the news with external calmness and resignation, never really recovered it; he became more puzzled and uncertain in his ways than ever, and I believe the business drifted more and more.

You have often seen the miniature of your father taken at that time, and it is very like him, so that you can imagine what a contrast his bright resolute face and his energetic ways presented to my father's timid and discouraged looks and manner. Perhaps it was the contrast which made Redmond Sullivan so attractive to him; anyhow, he liked him so much that even if he had had any prudent ideas about the unfitness or unwisdom of an attachment between Redmond and me, I do not think he would have taken courage to act on them. He had not any, however, and when I told him that Redmond Sullivan had asked me to be his wife, that we were prepared to wait until his circumstances should be better, and that we hoped he would sanction an engagement which was pretty sure to be condemned by all my other relatives and friends, he was as much astonished as if he had not been seeing the young man constantly, and seeing him in close attendance upon me on every possible opportunity.

"You'll have to wait, child," was all he said in the way of objection; "you couldn't marry on Sullivan's salary and what I can give you; but if you and he don't mind waiting for a good turn of fortune, I don't see that you can do better. He's the best and wisest fellow I ever knew, and I could die happy trusting you to him." These words of my father were as good as a fortune to me at the time. We were well contented to wait, and the happiest of the happy. Redmond was already high in the esteem and confidence of his employers, and we had the hopeful trust in the future which comes easily to young lovers."

"I don't think I should have been so contented as you were, mamma. I think I should have been afraid, too, of being not well off."

"I dare say; and it would not be natural you should be otherwise. Your bringing up has been very different from mine. Well, we waited and waited, and our friends talked of our engagement as being the most foolish thing possible, and some prophesied that it would never come to anything; and others said they wondered, considering my father had consented to allow me to 'throw myself away,' that he did not let us marry, and take up our abode with him. That would have seemed a simple plan indeed, but my father never proposed it, and when Redmond heard that other people talked of it, he told me he would not wish it, even for the sake of hastening our marriage; a man ought to make his wife's home for her, and always be master in his own. At length, one day, when our engagement had lasted two years, and I was twenty, Redmond told me that a chance had arisen for us, if my father could enable him to avail himself of it. He had been increasingly useful to the firm in whose employment he was of late; and they had told him if he could bring into the business the sum of two thousand pounds, they would give him a partnership."

"Two thousand pounds!" said Clare; "that's what papa is going to give me. Is it because it was the founding of his fortune? How delightful to find papa out in a bit of romance like that!"

"Wait a little, and you'll find your papa out in a yet more romantic notion. Two thousand pounds seemed an enormous and impossible sum to me then, and of great magnitude to Redmond; but he thought it not unlikely my father might be able to give it, as there was only me to be provided for then. Here would be an immediate provision for me, and a better one than we could possibly expect to obtain by waiting ever so patiently. I could only say that I was quite certain my father would give Redmond, or rather me, the money if he could, and advise him to speak to him frankly and at once. This Redmond did, and my father met the matter in exactly the spirit which I expected. He told Redmond more about his affairs than he had ever before admitted, acknowledged that his business was not prosperous, but said he had always intended to give me the small dowry he could afford on my wedding-day, being averse to exposing it to any risk by keeping the money in the business until his death; that he could give him the two thousand pounds, and that he entirely approved of the purchase of a partnership for Redmond with that money. Redmond expressed his gratitude to my father very warmly, and came in the highest spirits to tell me of his success, and to discuss our consequent arrangements.

It was on just such a day as this has been, and at the same season of the year, that your father and I and my father settled all about my wedding. My father, like most of the undecided people whom I have known, always wanted to do anything he really had made up his mind to, in a hurry, and he wished me to be married now without any further delay. We were to 'get the wedding over first,' he said, and to have a short marriage tour, and then to come back, and stay with him for a while, when the partnership could be concluded, and our future abode fixed upon. He grew quite cheerful and excited in talking about it. How well I remember his dear face, and his eager blue eyes, which had something childlike in them to the last, as he said, when Redmond was going away that night, 'You shall have the two thousand pounds in hurtful to me. It was dexterously circulated in Cork that the whole of the transaction of Kate Cronin's dowry,' as they called it, was a plot to deceive and entrap Redmond Sullivan; though what he was to be entrapped into, considering how long we had been engaged, was not very clear. Your poor grandfather's mistaken bit of parade in giving Redmond the money before so many witnesses was twisted into a deliberate scheme to defraud him, to be carried out with my assistance. It was well known, they said, tha Nicholas Cronin had not two thousand pounds outside of his business to spare, and Redmond Sullivan had been humbugged. I had given the money back to my father when I had the befooled husband quite secure, and that is the way the trick was done. One individual, more candid than the others, did object, I was told, to this theory, on the ground that it was Redmond, and not my father, who had confided the notes to my care; but this plea for me was set aside with more spite than logic by the argument that a fortunate accident had helped me in that particular, but at any rate I would have managed it somehow. A serious attempt was made to persuade your father to adopt this monstrous version of his terrible loss, but he merely put it away in his quietly decisive manner, and after some time, when he saw that the ill-natured stories in circulation, and the avoidance of me by some former acquaintances who thought proper to believe them, were telling upon my spirits, he made me promise him that I would never allude to the lost dowry in any way, either to himself or to any one else, and that I would put it out of my mind so far it was possible for me to do so.

"Time went on, and we prospered, and in one way these loss of the money produced an immediately good result. My father confided all his affairs to Redmond, and he put his mind to my father's business as well as to his own, with equal success. When your grandfather died, ten years ago, he was a prosperous man, and your father had long been a partner in the firm of Matthewson and Joyce. His services were too valuable to be jeopardized, and had well deserved such a recognition. That is our history, my darling, and you see there's a little bit of romance in your father's feeling about that particular sum of £2,000, though, as he says himself, it is not often a man has to say that he has built prosperity on the loss of a fortune."

For some moments after her mother ceased to speak, Clare kept silence. At last she said, with a tremor in her voice:

"There's something I should like so very much, and oh, I do so hope you will let me have it."

"What is it?"

Mrs. Sullivan's smile implied that there was little danger of a refusal.

"It is to let me wear at my wedding something that you wore at yours. The things are there; let me open the box, mamma. I should so like to be the one to open it."

"If—if you like," said Mrs. Sullivan, with a little reluctance. "Everything will be faded and useless, I'm afraid. But you shall do it, if you like."

"Your wreath, mamma, your wreath! I could have a spray out of it, at all events, and put it in a glass case with my own afterward. Wouldn't that be nice? Let me get the box; there's plenty of time before papa and Henry come home. It's in the box-room, isn't it? The corded box in the far corner; I'm sure that's the one."

Mrs. Sullivan assented.

"Where's the key?"

"I don't know; I have not had it for years. You had better get James to open the lock; it's quite a common one.

"And may I bring it here?"

"You may. But light the candles before you go. It is almost dark."

Clare complied, and then went off rejoicing on her errand, leaving her mother to many memories and reflections, which were not without emotion.

"Why, mother, the box wasn't locked at all," said Clare, as she re-entered the room. "It was only corded. I just raised the lid, but I did not touch a thing until I brought it to you. Put it down there, James, please." She pointed to the space beside her mother's chair.

The man left the room, and Clare went down on her knees with great alacrity, and raised the lid of the box. A sheet of limp and yellow tissue paper first disclosed itself. Clare looked at her mother.

"Go on, dear. Take the things out."

"Here's the wreath!" and Clare daintily picked up and swung between her fingers a garland of orange-blossoms of a form long unseen. The delicate flowers were slightly yellowed, but in perfect preservation.

"There, mamma," said Clare, "is that will do beautifully. Here's a lovely sandril, and to think that you wore that on your pretty hair five and twenty years ago!" She laid the wreath on her mother's lap and dived into the box again.

"Here's the veil!" She displayed a scarf of Limerick lace, such as brides in Ireland wore in the fourth decade of this century, and, hanging it without comment on the back of a chair, put her arm deeper down into the box and lifted out the wedding dress. Mother and daughter both looked at it in silence, almost with awe. A thousand recollections were awakened in the breast of the one; a strange sense, felt for the first time, of the sadness of change and time, stirred in the breast of the other, as they looked at the muslin and silk, perfectly new, and yet so old-fashioned: the garments of one day, with a history so short.

"I'll lay it on the bed," said Clare, and rose from her knees. She shook out the gown and looked at it, laughing.

"What a funny gown," she said. "You could not get into it now, mamma. I have such a mind to put it on, and surprise papa when he comes home. Do let me, mother! Men are so absurdly ignorant about women's clothes that I do believe I could persuade papa, and even Henry, that it is my own wedding gown. May I?"

"By all means, if it amuses you, my dear," replied her mother, who was following Clare's movements with her thoughtful eyes.

"Oh, that's delightful! The maids have begged so hard that I should not put on my wedding gown beforehand, I have been obliged to promise them, but they cannot make out that it can be unlucky to put on yours."

She took off her dress in a moment, and put on the quaint-looking gown. It fitted her slim young figure perfectly, and her mother saw before her an exact image, save for the sense of her hair, of what she herself had been when she wore that gown for the first and last time. Clare was standing before the glass, looking upon herself with childish glee, and making little dancing movements with her feet, when she said:

"Had they pockets in those times? Here's one, I declare, and your gloves in it." She pulled them out. "And something else, mamma. What's this?" She turned toward her mother, with something stretched between her hands. "Oh, mamma, mamma, it's a parcel of paper—of bank-notes."

"What! What do you say," exclaimed Mrs. Sullivan, starting up, and taking the object in question from her daughter's hands. Clare leaned against the bed, pale and shaking, while her mother eagerly examined the parcel.

At this moment the door was opened, and Redmond Sullivan came into the room.

"I got back early," he began at the threshold. What! what is that!" He looked at Clare in amazement, almost in alarm.

"Don't be frightened, papa," she said, "I have only put on mamma's wedding-dress for fun, but there was something in the pocket of it."

Her father turned to his wife.

"What does this mean?" he asked.

She held out to him the packet of bank notes, and said, "The Lost Dowry!"

"How strange that your memory could have been so much at fault," said Redmond Sullivan to his wife, when they were discussing this surprising discovery by themselves, while their daughter and her betrothed lover were saying a highly tautological "good-night" to each other on the lawn, "that you shouldn't have remembered my giving you the parcel."

"How strange that you should have misled my memory as you did, by telling me you gave me the parcel after I had changed my dress, instead of before; at the foot of the stairs as I came down, instead of at the foot of the stairs as I went up."

"Let us divide the blame," said Redmond Sullivan, laughing; "we can both afford it. And now, Kate, what will you do with your dowry?"

"I will double Clare's with it, if you approve."—New Quarterly Magazine.

COLOR POISONING.—A belief in color-poisoning by means of green dresses and green wall papers has already been forced upon the public by some tolerably conclusive evidence; but it seems that the mischievous propensities of this color are far from being yet fully exposed. A French savant, M. Paul Bert, has just exhibited against it articles of impeachment of the gravest character, supported by reports of a whole series of startling experiments. If his theory is true, it is not only the arsenic used in producing the color which does the injury, but the actual color itself; and a mere ray of green light is capable of affecting the health of the person exposed to it, even from all aid afforded to it by the smell, or presence of arsenic. To demonstrate this alleged fact, M. Bert has submitted several specimens of the sensitive plant to rays of different colors thrown upon them through stained glass, and in every case those which were treated to the most brilliant green light withered and died in the shortest time. In those plants which were exposed to a red light a peculiar phenomenon was observed. The tip or spikes of the leaves prolonged themselves and grew forward, in a lean and hungry fashion, horizontally with the branch from which they sprang; while in a blue light the contrary effect was produced, the spikes standing out abruptly and perpendicularly from their stem. On one of the plants being inclosed in a sort of lantern having red glass on one side and green on the other, instead of shrinking away from the poison on their right to the roseate antidote on their left, the leaves, as if by a fatal fascination, turned with one consent the other way, and literally looked death in the face.—Once a Week.

WHEN WHEAT IS GREEN.

When wheat is green in furrowed fields,
And forest lanes are lined with leaves,
And passion unto pleading yields,
And ev'ry mateless maiden grieves
For lack of love, at such a time
My pleasure will be in its prime.

The clouds, that keep away the sun,
And cover up the moon at night,
Before the strong March wind will run,
And leave the heavens blue and bright;
That rain will fall upon the sea—
The moon will light the wood for me.

And then, ah then! O dearest days!
Laburnum branches, thick with bloom,
Will throw their gold on garden ways,
And kiss the windows of my room;
And then the day! How will it be
To live in such felicity!

My brow with blossoms will be bound,
And from my fears I shall be free;
O tardy Time, bring quickly round
The merriest month of all for me!
That I may hear the church boys sing,
And on my finger see the ring!

GEORGE SAND.—We count upward of eighty books in the advertising list of her collected writings; nor is that list exhaustive. Notwithstanding the innumerable articles she contributed to various journals and magazines, she remains the Lope de Vega of French fiction; and if the writer of a single clever romance is to be regarded as a public benefactor, what are we to say of the author who had exerted herself so indefatigably for half a century for the public entertainment? There were two things that mainly contributed to this long and successful career of activity—her splendid physique and her mental many-sidedness. Balzac's critics have said that he wrote with his blood and muscle—with the frame of an athlete and the fire of an artist in love and glory. The same thing, in a measure, may be said of Scott, although his manner was more sober and better regulated; of Dumas, who burned the candle at both ends, and plunged with characteristic impetuosity into the pleasures of society in the intervals of busy séances in his library; and assuredly it may be said of George Sand. She was blessed with a constitution which bade defiance alike to anxieties, agitations, and the fretting of a fervid temperament and fancy; she tells us herself, in her Life, that she had scarcely ever an hour of sickness. And on the whole, and notwithstanding the somewhat unfeminine irregularity of her habits, she had given her constituion fair play to the last. She indulged, in moderation, in social pleasures, and in the society of chosen and sympathetic acquaintances; she sought occasional relaxation in foreign travel, and she passed great part of her time in the country. Her attachment to a country life is partly explained by that many-sidedness of hers, while it partly explains itself. It is Paris that distributes literary fame and rewards, absorbing aspirants into its vortex. The great majority of her countrymen, when they make themselves a name, at once become the slaves of the city and its artificial society. Of course there are exceptions. Powerful and original geniuses, like Balzac, break away from such enteebling restraint, and rise superior to such vulgar vanity; while the most charming books of such an idyllic writer as Souvestre have laid their scenes among the wilds of his native Brittany. But as for George Sand, she passionately loved the country. It associated itself inseparably with the first delightful recollections of her childhood, and she returned again and again to the scenes of her early loves. She was a poet and an artist in every fibre of her frame. She had passed many of the years of her youth in the half-reclaimed solitudes of Berri, and had learned to see the picturesque in what to others seemed savage to repulsion. She had again and again studied the poetry of details, so that she could recall them in an inexhaustible variety of descriptions. A few touches, slight but bold; the rush of water under a weeping-willow; a moss-grown mill-sluice, with a clump of alders; a shapeless hut on a scarred patch of moorland—and we have a picture in a line or two that brightens a page. And the people excited her imagination as much as their country. She knew the rough peasants to the core—with their patois, their cunning, and their boorish manners. She knew them, and she described them with wonderful fidelity, though she loved to idealize them on occasion, while preserving their characteristic features, and we may express an opinion, in passing, that it is in those minutable rural studies of hers that she will live when her more pretentious works are half-forgotten. After all, it she loved the country so intensely, it was because its peacefulness and primitive simplicity were enhanced to her by the sense of repose—of relief from the life that she lived elsewhere. She was essentially Bohemian in her nature; delighting in frequent change, like the gypsy, who seems to shift his tent with a certain unconscious instinct for the picturesque and the beautiful. Like him, she was the victim of passions that were hard to curb, and the creatures of present impulses; like him, she revolted against the social laws which more steadygoing people never dream of questioning. But then, besides the nobility of her nature, she had the genius, education, and opportunities that never fell to the gypsy's lot; and the course of her erratic wanderings carried her into various spheres of life and thought. From early childhood we see her noting her own feelings and carefully analyzing them; almost from infancy, too, she commenced her studies of surrounding character, and she had the opportunity of examining some remarkable specimens among the relatives and servants with whom she was in the closest contact. She assures us that she never sat for her own Indiana—that she never drew any one of her portraits so that any one should justly identify it with an original. That may be. We believe no great literary artist ever did copy servilely; and it is the art of those who have depicted character most successfully to be able to combine, select, and modify, so that the result shall stand out in lifelike harmony. But it is impossible to study Indiana, or any other of her most forcible female types, without being impressed by the sense that they owe their force and their cleverness to the light that has been thrown on them in their inception from her close self-examinations. And as for her characters in general, even when their ideas are most far-fetched, and their theories of existence most speculative and impracticable, you are rarely disturbed in your consciousness of their intense vitality. Thanks to her birth and family connections on the one side, her tastes and the mixed society into which they threw her on the other, she enjoyed manifold advantages in the study of life. Her own existence was anything but unruffled: and we need hardly say that her sorrows and troubles have all turned out for the benefit of her readers. No one can depict the conflicts of feeling as she has done; no one can analyze the anatomy of sorrow or imagine the compensating transports of periods or exaltation who has not gone through much of it all with a sensitive and finely-strung organization. There are situations which imagination fails altogether to conceive, and which can only be grappled with by sad experience.—Blackwood's Magazine.

DICKENS AND BALZAC.—Dickens and Balzac take much in common; as individuals they strongly resemble each other; their differences are chiefly differences of race. Each was a man of affairs, an active, practical man, with a temperament of almost phenomenal vigor and a prodigious quantity of life to expend. Each had a character and a will, what is nowadays called a personality, which imposed themselves irresistibly; each had a boundless self-confidence and a magnificent egotism. Each had always a hundred irons on the fire; each was resolutely determined to make money, and made it in large quantities. In intensity of imaginative power, the power of evoking visible objects and figures, seeing them themselves with the force of hallucination, and making others see them all but just as vividly, they were almost equal. Here there is little to choose between them; they have no rivals but each other and Shakespeare. But they most of all resemble each other in the fact that they treated their extraordinary imaginative force as a matter of business; that they worked it as a gold mine, violently and brutally; overworked and ravaged it. They succumbed to the task that they had laid upon themselves, and they are as similar in their deaths as in their lives. Of course, if Dickens is an English Balzac, he is a very English Balzac. His fortune was the easier of the two, and his prizes were greater than the other's. His brilliant, opulent English prosperity, centered in a home and diffused through a progeny, is in strong contrast to the almost scholastic penury and obscurity of much of Balzac's career. But the analogy is still very striking.—Galaxy.

JEAN PAUL RICHTER.—Jean Paul twice visited Weimar—the first time in 1796, just in the flush of the great success of his "Hesperus." He went at once to Goethe, Wieland, Herder. After a round of visits to the notabilities, he writes, cynically, to his friend Otto: "Schon am zweiten Tage, warf ich hier mhin dummes Vorurtheil für grosse Autoren ab, als wären es andere Leute." Jean Paul had in him a strain of vanity and a touch of affectation; nor could he easily sink self. He resented the Weimar leadership of German literature, and did not consider what service he might have rendered to letters by cordially supporting it. On Goethe he did not make a favorable impression. Goethe, writing to Schiller, then at Jena, termed Richter's "Hesperus" einen Tragelaphen erster Sorte. This Aristophanic epithet may be paraphrased into "an extremely fantastic animal"—i.e., one compounded of a goat and a stag. What was said of the work seems to have been also meant for the man. Goethe adds that he does not think Jean Paul will ever assist them in any practical way. Schiller agreed with his friend's estimate of their visitor; and yet both poets did full justice to the great and unique merits of Jean Paul. Personal characteristics play often as important a part as a man's abilities; and Jean Paul was not quite great or unselfish enough to help men greater than himself to accomplish noble work. His personality and his training were both in the way of cordial relations with Goethe and Schiller. He was passionately full of modern instinct in art, and was defiantly in opposition to the antique beauty of perfect form and exquisite proportion in literary work. He praises Goethe's pantheon of a house in the "Frauenplan." He awaits with trepidation the appearance of the god, finds him cold and monosyllabic, but describes his eye as a ball of light. They drank champagne together; an animated conversation about art arose between them, and then man war bei Goethe—"I saw Goethe." Schiller rather repelled the glowing Titan, who threw himself into the arms of the Fronde, and became intimate with Wieland and with Herder. On his second visit to Weimar, in 1799, Jean Paul consorted ostentatiously with the opponents of the Dioscuri; and his description of his meeting with Herder may be quoted as a curious example of the manners of the time. He says: "Beneath the open sky I hung upon his [Herder's] lips, and on his breast. I could scarcely speak in the tumult of my joy; I could only weep! Herder could not embrace me enough. When I looked round, I saw that Knebel's eyes also were wet." Rosseau would have made a good third in this touching scene of weeping and of kissing. A sarcastic remark of Jean Paul against Goethe was promptly avenged in the Xenien, and the breach between him and the two Great Powers became too wide to be bridged over. Jean Paul retained his original prejudice against the chiefs. And yet it is a pity that Jean Paul could not have been added to Goethe and to Schiller as their coadjutor. Despite his caprices and vanities, he was yet the only man worthy of that post which Kotzebue had vainly striven to grasp; and he could—working cordially with two such men—have rendered great service to Germany and German literature. Jean Paul, through the grotesque and bizarre, was yet a poet. He is certainly the greatest humorist in German literature; and he is a poetical humorist. The source and fount of his peculiar humor is not drollery, but is excited by the conflict, ever going on in human existence, between the ideals of youthful enthusiasm and the actual facts of social and practical life. Hence his humor is sad, is tender, is earnest, is essentially poetical. He lacked the intense feeling for the beautiful which distinguished Goethe; he had not the swing, the impulse, the enthusiasm of Schiller; his want of the sense of form led him often into mere eccentricity in his writings, nor is his style free from affectations on the top of extravagances; but he would yet have added to the eager art ethics of Schiller, and to the exalted æsthetic idealism of Goethe, a tenderness, a humor, and a conscience, a sympathy with the purely modern spirit, which were all his own.—Contemporary Review.

A MYSTERIOUS DISAPPEARANCE.—In the year 1768 there dwelt at Shepton Mallet, in the county of Somerset, an old man named Owen Parfitt. In his youth he had been a soldier, and had been in Africa—in military, and, as the townsfolk whispered, other capacity. His temper was violent, and his language very military in character. Altogether he was not a popular person, albeit perforce inoffensive. He was a cripple, able to carry on the trade of a tailor for several years, but, at the date already mentioned, he was quite helpless. His house was kept for him by a sister older than himself, who seems to have taken excellent care of him. As he was not able to get out of bed without assistance, his sister often asked a young woman, named Susannah Snook, to lend her a hand to lift the old man into a chair while his bed was being made; and his chair was usually placed either in the passage, or just outside the door, that he might enjoy a little air. One day, as the sun was shining very brightly, the two women wrapped Owen Parfitt in an old great-coat, and carried him in his arm-chair outside on the door-step, that he might sun himself for awhile. A quarter of an hour afterward he was gone. The chair remained where it had been placed; the old great-coat was thrown over it; but the man was gone. The first alarm was raised by the sister, who was found by Susannah Snook, who had only quitted her a few minutes before, crying bitterly for the loss of her brother. This Susannah Snook gave her account in the year 1814 to Dr. Butler, at that time head-master of Shrewsbury School, and afterward Bishop of Lichfield, and her evidence was corroborated by many persons then living at Shepton Mallet, or in the neighborhood. The sister of Owen Parfitt told her that "after the bed was made, and Susannah had left, she had gone up stairs; and on coming down again and not hearing her brother, she called 'Owen!' That there was no answer; and she went to where she and Susannah had left him, and found nothing but the chair, and the old great-coat lying on it." The alarm spread rapidly through the town, and search was immediately made everywhere in the neighborhood; the roads and fields for a great distance round were hunted over; all the wells and ponds were dragged, but to no purpose. No trace was ever found of Owen Parfitt. Susannah Snook further said that the weather had been fair during the day; but after the alarm was given it began to thunder and lighten, with a heavy fall of rain, which continued for some time. She herself was wet through in returning to her house. Renewed inquiries into this well-attested mystery have rather deepened than explained it. That the man disappeared suddenly there is no manner of doubt, for that early life had been of a wild and desperate character is also certain, for he was in receipt of no pension for serving the king, and had most probably fought in Africa "for his own hand." No person had the slightest interest in his death, as his earnings maintained him, and his sister had a small allowance from the parish. Several old people, who remembered all the circumstances, gave the same account with regard to the chief facts, and particularly as to the general excitement and uproar in the town, as soon as the alarm was given, and as to the immediate and careful search everywhere made for the missing man. They all agreed, also, that Owen Parfitt was commonly placed of an afternoon either in a passage, or just outside of the door for the sake of fresh air. There seems to be no doubt that he was and had been a cripple for years, and, also, that if his strength had been miraculously recovered, he could hardly have gone far without being seen. His cottage was on the turnpike road, surrounded by other cottages close at hand, not 100 yards from the streets of the town, and he must have passed along clothed only as he had been taken from his bed. It was a warm June afternoon, the "mowing grass" was about, and the fields were full of people; the town is surrounded not by arable but by grass land almost everywhere. Within half an hour after he was last seen, the whole disposable population of a town then numbering between four and five thousand inhabitants, were in pursuit of him, and if he had dropped from exhaustion—he was 70 years old—it is almost certain that he must have been found. The search was continued for several days without avail, and then the good people of Shepton Mallet made up their minds, such as they were. They soon arrived at a solution of the mystery. The day had been fine up to the disappearance of Owen Parfitt, which was followed by a terrific storm of thunder and lightning and rain. He had been a wicked—perhaps a frightfully wicked—man in his youth. "Putting this and that together," there could be no doubt about the matter. The old soldier, sailor, slaver, and tailor had been carried off by the devil!—All The Year Round.

BALZAC IN HIS LETTERS.—Balzac's letters to his future wife, as to every one else, deal almost exclusively with his financial situation. He discusses the details of this matter with all his correspondents, who apparently have—or are expected to have—his monetary entanglements at their fingers' ends. It is a constant enumeration of novels and tales begun or delivered, revised or bargained for. The tone is always profoundly sombre and bitter. The reader's general impression is that of lugubrious egotism. It is the rarest thing in the world that there is an allusion to anything but Balzac's own affairs, and to the most sordid details of his own affairs. Hardly an echo of the life of his time, of the world he lived in, finds its way into his letters; there are no anecdotes, no impressions, no opinions, no descriptions, no allusions to things heard, people seen, emotions felt—other emotions, at least, than those of the exhausted or the exultant worker. The reason of all this is of course very obvious. A man could not be such a worker as Balzac and be much else besides. The note of animal spirits which we observed in his early letters is sounded much less frequently as time goes on; although the extraordinary robustness and exuberance of his temperament plays richly into his books. The Contes Drôlatiques are full of it, and his conversation was also full of it. But the letters constantly show us a man with the edge of his spontaneity gone—a man groaning and sighing, as from Promethean lungs, complaining of his tasks, denouncing his enemies, and in complete ill humor generally with life. Of any expression of enjoyment of the world, of the beauties of nature, art, literature, history, human character, these pages are singularly destitute. And yet we know that such enjoyment—instinctive, unreasoning, essential—is half the inspiration of the poet. The truth is that Balzac was as little as possible of a poet; he often speaks of himself as one, but he deserved the name as little as his own Canalis or his own Rubempré. He was neither a poet nor a moralist, though the latter title in France is often bestowed upon him—a fact which strikingly helps to illustrate the Gallic lightness of soil in the moral region. Balzac was the hardest and deepest of prosateurs; the earth-scented facts of life, which the poet puts under his feet, he had put above his head. Obviously there went on within him a vast and constant intellectual untoldig. His mind must have had a history of its own—a history of which it would be most interesting to have an occasional glimpse. But the history is not related here, even in glimpses. His books are full of ideas; his letters are almost mute. It is probably not unfair to argue from this fact that there were few ideas that he greatly cared for. Making all allowance for the pressure and tyranny of circumstances, we may believe that if he had greatly cared to se recueillir, as the French say—greatly cared, in the Miltonic phrase, "to interpose a little ease"—he would sometimes have found an opportunity for it. Perpetual work, when it is joyous and salubrious, is a very fine thing; but perpetual work, when it is executed with the temper which more than half the time appears to have been Balzac's, has in it something almost debasing. We constantly feel that his work would have been vastly better if the Muse of "business" had been elbowed away by her larger-browed sister. The letters, doubtless, often felt in the same way; but, on the whole, "business" was what he most cared for. The Comédi Humaine represents an immense amount of joy, of spontaneity, of irrepressible artistic life. Here and there in the letters this occasionally breaks out in accents of mingled exultation and despair. "Never," he writes in 1836, "has the torrent which bears me along been more rapid; never has a work more majestically terrible imposed itself upon the human brain. I go to my work as the gamester to the gaming-table; I am sleeping now only five hours and working eighteen; I shall arrive dead. * * * Write to me; be generous; take nothing in bad part, for you don't know how, at moments, I deplore this life of fire. But how can I jump out of the chariot?" We had occasion in writing of Balzac in these pages more than a year ago, to say that his great characteristic, far from being a passion for ideas, was a passion for things. We said just now that his books are full of ideas; but we must add that his letters make us feel that these ideas are themselves, in a certain sense, "things." They are pigments, properties, frippery; they are always concrete and available. Balzac cared for them only it they would fit into his inkstand. In speaking formerly of Balzac, we insisted upon the fact that he lacked charm; but we said that our last word upon him should be that he had incomparable power. His letters only confirm these impressions, and above all they deepen our sense of his strength. They contain little that is delicate, and not a great deal that is positively agreeable; but they express an energy before which we stand lost in wonder, in an admiration that almost amounts to awe. The fact that his devouring observation of the great human spectacle has no echo in his letters only makes us feel how concentrated and how intense was the labor that went on in his closet. Certainly no solider intellectual work has ever been achieved by man. And in spite of the massive egotism, the personal absoluteness, to which these pages testify, they leave us with a downright kindness for the author. He was coarse, but he was tender; he was corrupt in a way, but he was hugely natural. If he was ungracefully eager and voracious, awkwardly blind to all things that did not contribute to his personal plan, at least his egotism was exerted in a great cause. The Comédie Humaine has a thousand faults, but it is a monumental excuse.—Galaxy.

A VILLAGE IN MADRAS.—Leaving the well, we pass into the village hard by, one of ordinary size, containing perhaps 40 or 50 houses, built on an irregular piece of land over which the dry limestone rock crops up, useless for cultivation and overgrown with a tall plant bearing broad bluish-green leaves and large pods filled with silky fibres, that covers waste places, like docks at home. There is a small street of low, windowless houses, thatched or tiled, a strong wooden door in the middle of each, and on either side of it a divanlike seat runs along under the broad impending eaves, curving up at the ends couch-fashion. This outside verandah, which is the family gathering-place and drawing-room, is whitewashed and banded with red, as are all the walls. Beyond the street the abodes of the lower caste lie dispersed—here a cluster of round peak-roofed huts, there some better dwellings with small inclosed yards, in which grow a cocoa-nut tree or two; the whole surrounded with a rough stone wall whitewashed and red-striped, as are also the tree-trunks. Somewhat apart a few weavers are plying their craft; the strong cloths, some twenty-two yards long, on which they are employed are stretched upon supports under a line of flowering trees planted for the purpose, and they pace rapidly up and down these primitive looms, shuttle in hand; their trade is much diminished since their fabrics, made to wear, have been supplanted by floods of the cheaper English, made to sell. Somewhere in or near the village a big old banyan or peepul tree will be seen rising from the middle of a square stone-built platform, as usual striped white and red; here gather the elders to settle disputes and questions of caste, and not far off will be the village temple, a small sacellum, solidly built of small red bricks, little ornamented, and devoted to one of the Saktis, or malignant forms of the wife of Siva, a deity and worship doubtless of aboriginal descent, adopted by the Brahmans into their mythology to increase their influence. By its steps are placed two or three snake-stones—time-worn granite blocks bearing a cobra rudely sculptured in relief on one side, in an upright posture, with folds disposed right and left, sometimes having one, sometimes five heads, the hoods always expanded; occasionally a woman's bust ends Melusinalike in serpent-coils. Everywhere over the country at the foot of trees, placed before or ranged round the walls of temples, these stones are met with, generally blurred and moldered with age; some have regarded them as the oldest sculptures in India, relics of primitive snake-worshipping races.—Fraser's Magazine.

WILLIAM H. SEWARD.

AUTOBIOGRAPHICAL ANECDOTES.

SEWARD'S EARLY LIFE AND EDUCATION—HIS YOUTHFUL REBELLION—TEACHING IN GEORGIA—HIS DEBUT AS A LAWYER—INTERVIEWS WITH LAFAYETTE—FIRST VISIT TO EUROPE.

The following anecdotes of the late William H. Seward are selected from advance sheets of a volume about to be issued by D. Appleton & Co. The bulk of the work is made up of a memoir of Mr. Seward by his son, Frederick W. Seward. To this is prefixed a brief autobiography, from which these extracts are taken:

MR. SEWARD'S ANCESTRY.

"I can tell you little of my ancestors. I knew the fathers of my father and mother only by name and tradition. John Seward, of Morris County, New-Jersey, has been described to me as a gentleman of Welsh descent, intelligent, public-spirited, and courteous. He bore, bravely and well, a colonel's commission in the Revolutionary War, and educated a numerous family respectably. He died in 1799. His wife, Mary Swezy, lived until 1816. I remember her as a highly-intellectual woman, pious as well as patriotic, although many of her relations had adhered to the British cause, and consequently found it convenient to seek an asylum after the war in Nova Scotia and Canada. Of my maternal grandfather, Isaac Jennings, I know only that he was of English derivation, a well-to-do farmer, and turned out with the Militia of Goshen, and, more fortunate than most of his associates, escaped the Indian massacre at the battle of Minisink. His wife, Margaret Jackson, who was of Irish descent, survived him many years. Her peculiarity was passion. I most distinctly remember was, antipathy toward the Roman Catholic religion. My father, Samuel S. Seward, received such a classic education as the academies of that period furnished, Columbia College, the only one in the colony of New-York, being disorganized during the war. He was educated a physician, and during my minority practiced his profession, to which occupation he added those of the farmer, the merchant, the country politician, magistrate, and Judge, discharging the functions of all with eminent ability, integrity, and success, and gradually building up what at that day, and in that rural neighborhood seemed a considerable fortune. He represented Orange County in the State Legislature in 1804, and showed much vigor and ability in debate. My mother, Mary Jennings, enjoyed only the advantages of education in country schools, but improved them. She is remembered by her survivors as a person of excellent sense, gentleness, truthfulness, and candor."

EARLY SCHOOL DAYS.

"I remember only one short period when the school-room and class emulation were not quite so attractive to me as the hours of recess and recreation. But this devotion was not without its trials. My native village, Florida, then consisted of not more than a dozen dwellings. While the meeting-house was close by, the nearest school-house was half a mile distant. It stood on a rock, over which hung a precipitous wooded cliff. The school-house was one story high; built half of stone and half of wood. It had a low dark attic, which was reached by a ladder. They did say, at the time, that a whole family of witches dwelt in that wooded cliff above the school-house by day, and that they came down from that favorite haunt and took up their lodgings, by night, in the little attic. One day, before I had reached the age at which I was to take a legitimate place in the school, I went there with my elder brothers without parental permission. While there, and all alone, I got into the dark, the light from the windows failing. The larger boys and girls were formed in a circle round the open door to recite their customary lessons. I had no doubt that the tyrannical schoolmaster had kept us in school until night, and I expected every moment to see the aerial monsters that dwelt in the attic enter the school-house and make short work of us all for obstructing them in their way to their nocturnal abode in the garret. Crying vociferously, I was discharged from the school and ran for my life homeward. On the way I met what seemed to me a great crowd, some of whom were looking down into a pail of standing water, while others were gazing into the heavens through fragments of smoked glass. In after years, I came to learn that I had thus been an observer of the total eclipse of the sun which occurred in the year 1806. The phenomenon repeated itself only four years afterward, under the sixtieth parallel of latitude, in the midst of the Indians of Alaska. * * *

At the age of 9 years I was transferred to the Farmers' Hall Academy at Goshen, where my father has been educated. I boarded there with two affectionate cousins, who were nieces of my father, and daughters of the brother-in-law under whom he studied his profession. You have known those ladies well. I need not tell you of the enduring friendship which grew out of that relation. I began then my study of Latin, but my rural training had not prepared me for association with the ambitious youth of the county capital, and I soon realized that, as I came from a neighboring village, I must establish my right by single combat; and all of whom were disgusted with my refusal to join them in abusing the master out when he required us to attend school on Christmas Day. I cheerfully retired in the Spring to private life at home, and the graduate of a New-England college had been employed in a new academy which, in the meantime, had been erected.

My preparation for college was chiefly made here. I was not long in coming to the discovery that the elaborate education appointed for me had its labors and trials. My daily routine began at 5 in the morning and closed at 9 at night. The tasks were just the utmost that I could execute, and every day a little more; even the intervals allowed for recreation were utilized. It was my business to drive the cows, morning and evening, to and from distant pastures, to chop and carry in the fuel for the parlor fire, to take the grain to mill and fetch the flour, to bring the lime from the kiln, and to do the errands of the family generally; the time of my elder brothers being too precious to permit them to be withdrawn from their labors in the store and on the farm. How happy were the Winter evenings, when the visit of a neighbor brought out the apples, nuts, and cider, and I was indulged with a respite from study, and listened to conversation, which generally turned upon politics or religion! * * *

The opening of an academy at Florida was attended by one of those efforts for local improvement which, for the most part, merely convalesce in this one did, but which can seldom be injurious. Too much is expected of them, and the failure to realize all brings reaction, followed by ridicule, the most effective weapon of conservatism. The ascent to an academy, from a school which was of the lowest class, never attaining half the stability or character which belongs to the common school under our present district system, was abrupt, and therefore impossible. Nevertheless, teacher, parents, and pupils were of one consent in trying it. Very ludicrous incidents occurred. The plan embraced four distinct measures, all of which seemed to the pupils of my age, and perhaps even to our rural parents, new inventions. First, we were to learn to 'declaim select pieces.' Second, we were to 'write original compositions.' Third, we were to have a 'debating society.' Fourth, an annual or semi-annual 'dramatic exhibition.' Charles Jackson, a farmer's son, I think 14 years old, but large enough for 18, dull and awkward, was called upon to open the exercises in declamation, with the speech of Romulus on the foundation of Rome. At the first attempt, taking his place in the middle of the school-room, with arms hanging down straight, and his head bowed to the floor, he spoke the speech in a low and perfectly monotonous manner, and was dismissed with the master's criticism that he had done very well for the first effort, but, on the next Thursday, he must speak with head erect, and turn from one side of the audience toward the other. With continual prompting, he managed to lift his eyes, and roll his head from right to left, with regular alternation, through the whole exercise. This proved, to the awkward boy, a sad encouragement, when it brought the further requisition that, on the third rehearsal, he should gesticulate with his arms and change the posture of his feet. He honestly declared that he could not understand the process, nor the object of the required movements of his arms and legs. Thereupon the master opened a page of The Monitor, and showing him a diagram, in which the orator was represented standing with head erect, facing a dotted line drawn across the opposite wall, a similar dotted line drawn across under his feet, one arm horizontally extended from the shoulder, with a dotted line extending from the end of the thumb to the wall, and the other arm raised at an angle of 45°, with a dotted line from the thumb of that hand stretching also diagonally to the wall. The diagram only confused the pupil still more. The master closed up the affair by taking a stand and going through the motions indicated by the diagram, shifting his feet first to one side and then to the other, lifting one arm and then the other, and thus showed how easily it could be done. Thereupon Charles, thus instructed, took the master's place, and aiming as well as he could at the points designated on the wall, and turning his head to the right, lifted his right arm out, straight and stiff; then, suddenly dropping that arm and turning his head to the left, he lifted the other to the same position, and so, with the regularity, precision, and quickness of a clock-pendulum, sawed the air, and meanwhile, with a crawling intonation, addressed the people of the newly-established city of Rome in a manner that Livy never dreamed of:

We should have great reason to be in fear (sawing with left arm)
For that which we have now built,' (sawing with right arm.)

Charles Jackson I think was discouraged. He certainly never became even a stump orator or a Methodist exhorter.

It was mine to lead off in the second great exercise—that of 'original composition.' Not having the least idea of what was wanted, or how it was to be done, I moved to the side of Robert Armstrong, a young man 18 years old, self-possessed and capable of instructing me, because he had already been a pupil at the famous Academy of Meadham, New-Jersey. He told me nothing was easier. 'You are,' said he, 'first to take a subject, and then all you have to do is to write about it.'

'But,' said I, 'what is a subject?'

He replied, 'It is anything you want to write about.'

'But,' said I, 'I don't know of anything that I do want to write about. I wish I could see a composition.'

'Well,' said he, 'if you won't tell, I will show you an old one of mine, that I wrote at Meadham.'

Having bound myself to secrecy, he showed me a composition, which was after this sort: 'On Drunkenness.' (A heavy black line was drawn under this caption.) 'Drunkenness is the worst of all vices.' Then followed an argument which, I think, well sustained the proposition thus confidently announced. I do not know why, perhaps because I was constitutionally an optimist, I decided instantly that I would not choose for my subject anything that was naughty, bad, or wicked. So I said, 'I will choose a different subject, and will show the composition to you when it is written.' He promised me his help. I wrote with great labor my essay, brought it and submitted it to him. It began: 'On Virtue. Virtue is the best of all vices!' My success in my department seemed as hopeless as Charles Jackson's in his."

COLLEGE LIFE.

Young Seward was matriculated at Union College, Schenectady, in 1816. His experiences were not unlike those of many other country lads. He says:

"My first session in college was not without its mortifications. When I came to write what are called compositions, I found that, having rarely practiced it, I wrote with difficulty, and confusedly, and it seemed to me that difficulty was insuperable, because I had no general supply of facts or knowledge. The first time I rose to speak I encountered a general simper, which, before I got through, broke into laughter. On carefully inquiring the reasons, I found I had a meas

THE COMING STAMPEDE.

A RUSH FOR THE NEW EL DORADO.

THE GREATEST GOLD EXCITEMENT IN TWENTY YEARS—EMIGRATION FROM ALL QUARTERS TO THE BLACK HILLS—A SEVERE WINTER ON THE PLAINS—PROSPECTS OF THE GOLD HUNTERS.

CHEYENNE, Saturday, Jan. 27, 1877.

The great stampede of the year, and the greatest for 20 years, has about begun. Before Summer it will be at its height. It is setting toward the Black Hills. It will take all the drift material from San Juan, will draw heavily from the old mining districts of Colorado, Utah, Nevada, and California, and will gather the idlers that dream of fortunes, and many of the broken-up merchants and enterprising young adventurers from all over the country. What the upshot of this will be none can tell. But if the larger share of the 50,000 people who will rush forward to the new land of gold in the next six months do not come straggling back demoralized and dead broke before next Winter, it will be because other stampedes draw them further off, perhaps over toward the Pacific coast, or because the Black Hills, with all the puffing that it has had, is a great deal better than has been pictured. California and the Pike's Peak country did not show up their real riches to the multitudes who first thronged thither, and the discouraging reports that followed and the distressed looking pilgrims who returned East created for some time such a reaction that the new gold fields were looked upon as a snare and a delusion, and came nigh being depopulated with almost as remarkable celerity as they had been settled up. We cannot tell whether this will be the fate of the Black Hills country. At the worst, we do not think it could suffer quite the drawbacks that Colorado did in 1859 and 1860. The majority of those who are going in there have had severe schooling; have had mining life in its worst forms; have not been homes since childhood; are not easily frightened at poverty or Indians; and have, in fact, that summum bonum of grit and don't-care which frontiersmen call "sand in the craw." These will be the leaders of the camp, and they will hold the throng sufficiently in check to prevent any such pell-mell routs as that of 1859, for instance, when the Pike's Peakers precipitately started home.

When I say that the stampede of the year has already begun, I am aware that I state a somewhat surprising fact; for it is the worst Winter that the oldest inhabitant can think of in the Rocky Mountain country. There have been deep snow, bitter cold winds, and almost perishing weather for one to be far away from the settlements. The cold snap is still upon us. There was never a time before when old plainsmen so readily took their chances; the wild animals of the plains, antelope, wolves, jack-rabbits, have come into the corrals and pre-emptors' cabins for shelter; the herds are thin from exposure and lack of food. And yet, with such a Winter as this, and the perils that a journey northward carries with it, there are teams and outfits going toward Custer and Deadwood diggings almost every day. Last week 100 freighters and packteams went forward, and others are preparing to go. Several wagons with supplies and miners' tools have come from Sunshine, Boulder, Fort Collins, and Greeley, Colorado. Teams are outfitting at Denver. Some are on the way from Salt Lake City. Every day or two there are arrivals from St. Louis, Chicago, Omaha, and occasionally from the far East. When these "pilgrims" are asked why they go into the diggings now, when work is pretty much suspended there and everything frozen up, their invariable answer is that they want to be on the ground and get the pick of the chances before the great rush of the Spring opens; and again, the Indians who hug their camp fires in cold weather, are not so apt to trouble them now.

But the comparatively few who are setting out now give only a hint of what is to follow. You have only to visit some of the towns in this section of country, such as Laramie, Sidney, Denver, Greeley, Colorado Springs, and Pueblo, and a casual talk with this and that one here and there, particularly with those known as "old timers," and it becomes apparent at once that a good many of them are making preparations to go into the Black Hills. Of course, San Juan will draw some of them; but the greater number are bound for Custer and Deadwood, or the new diggings of Battle Creek and Wolf Mountain. There is not so much excitement about it in the old mining camps of Gilpin and Clear Creek Counties, for the past year has been unusually prosperous with them; and nearly all the miners and business men are doing well, and are wise enough to let well enough alone. In Denver there will be more to join the stampede than there were last year. Some are going into the freighting business; some will take stocks of goods to Custer, Deadwood, or some of the new miners' camps; others will go to prospect. Denver is very well situated as a supply point for the Black Hills, as it is for the San Juan mines, it being about equidistant between them, and its wholesale dealers are working up a good trade in both directions. In spite of hard times, the population of Denver is now greater than ever before. There are no empty houses, and building has been going forward all the Fall and Winter so far as the weather would permit. Should the Black Hills fever take a couple of thousand from its 25,000 inhabitants, it will be no very great loss; the increasing trade with that section will more than make it up.

Of course, the same interest that did so much to work up a Black Hills mania last year and years before, when everybody, the agitators included, more than half suspected that it was all a humbug, are the prime movers in working up the present excitement. They have something tangible to go on now. The diggings have turned out some gold, handsome nuggets have been shown, and a few snug fortunes made. Speculators and agents are at work in Chicago and St. Louis, and probably in New-York and Boston. Pamphlets and circulars more glowing than ever, are being scattered broadcast. The railway companies running in the direction of this El Dorado; the towns which are seeking the prestige and profit that being a depot of supplies or advantageous outfitting point will bring them, and individual speculators who have "claims" to market, or a stake to raise in some way, are the chief advertising agencies of the Black Hills country. They are, for this season at least, "fishers of men;" and how tempting is the bait which they throw out may be seen from the following paragraph from one of their publications:

"The gold is here. It is in almost every gulch, on every hillside, on every mountain top, in places and in quartz. It is here for the poor man and for the capitalist. It is to be divided among laborers, merchants, mechanics, and manufacturers. There is enough for all who will come, and those who wish to flee from the hard times of the East, and avail themselves of the hidden treasures of this the last and richest gold field on the globe, had better make their arrangements to come early. This is a show in which the front seats cannot be reserved; the first occupant holds them."

The estimates of gold taken out of the Black Hills last season, as made by Cheyenne and Omaha parties, is far greater than any of my old acquaintances, well-informed men and experienced miners, who spent last year in the diggings, in my conversations with them, have yet placed it. Their calculations generally run from a half to three-quarters of a million; while Omaha merchants, and, I think, too, the Union Pacific Railroad authorities, figure it at $2,000,000; while Cheyenne bankers and the newspapers here claim that a million and a half were brought out, and about as much more remains distributed among the present population of the various camps in the Hills. I think that many of the parties engaged in this work of spreading pamphlets and circulars are "playing for high stakes." Some of the publications now in press, I am told, write up the Black Hills and at the same time go out of their way to write down the San Juan country. Whatever may be the effect of this, I am inclined to think it a waste of powder, for undoubtedly the great wave of emigration will, for this season at least, flow toward the Black Hills. I have seen all kinds of estimates made of the amount of population the various new diggings up there will receive before the end of the year. None place it at less than 30,000, and many express the belief that it will exceed 100,000. I am inclined to think that the contiguous States and Territories and the Missouri Valley region alone will contribute 20,000 people to this great army of gold-seekers. Letters of inquiry from all parts of the East, and newspaper paragraphs speaking of parties who are making ready, would seem to indicate a very much greater immigration than last year.

I spoke of the fact that parties were now going northward every day from this point. I understand that there is considerable stir at Sidney, Sioux City, Bismarck, and Yankton in the same direction. The Territorial Legislature is in session at the latter place, and a delegation from Custer and Deadwood has been before it asking legislation such as is adapted to the new mining camps. Facts and statistics regarding the present condition of the towns, and the resources of the country have also been presented, and the Legislature asked to publish them as an immigration document. But it is said that the new population of the Black Hills and the people at Yankton are not in very cordial sympathy, and that many of the former are very clamorous for a Territorial organization of their own, and cutting off allegiance to Dakota. A delegate has been sent to Washington, and on being interviewed by a local reporter here as to his mission, he stated that his people want a new Territory, to be called El Dorado, created, to extend from the 43d to the 47th parallel of latitude, and from the 102d to the 107th meridian of longitude, embracing a tract of about 80,000 square miles.

Most of the towns in the Hills, which were to some extent depopulated last Fall, have picked up a good deal during the Winter. A gentleman just in from Deadwood says that there are not less than 5,000 people there, and at Custer about 500; while Gayville, Bone Butte, and other camps are lively. The stampede to Wolf Mountain has subsided; but there has been quite a rush to Battle Creek, 20 miles from Custer, where over 50 claims were taken in a single day, and the new mining towns of Frenchtown, Hayward, and Harney have been started.

It has been a hard Winter in the diggings. The snow is reported all the way from two to three feet, with great and impassable drifts between some of the camps. A few who took the precaution to "house over" the entrance to their shafts have been able to prosecute work right along; but the great majority of claims have been abandoned for the Winter. The thermometer has been as low as 30° below zero. There has been plenty of fuel and provisions in all of the camps, as freighting teams from Cheyenne and Sidney have succeeded in breaking the roads, and the semi-weekly stages have kept communication open with the outside world, though they have been obliged to throw off their wheels and come down to extemporized runners. Tariffs are high, and teamsters are making a good thing. Where four or five pilgrims "chip in," they can get carried over to Harney City from Custer for $50, distance, 20 miles. Freighters, who have gone from points on the railroad to Custer, Deadwood, or Battle Creek, although selling out at a good round price, have hurried homeward again, declaring that it costs them $10 per day for provender for a span of mules. The prices current are in some respects at a "high pinch." Corn and oats are $8 to $10, and flour $10 to $16 per hundred pounds; hay, $60 per ton; sugar, 20 to 30 cents; apples, 10 cents apiece; coal-oil, $1 50 per gallon; eggs, $1 per dozen; bacon, 30 cents, and potatoes 25 cents per pound. The large number of idlers now in the hills are obliged to draw on their reserve funds, if they have the good luck to have any; and live on scant fare at that. It is not expected that these prices will keep up, as the large numbers who will go into the freighting business from various outfitting points in the Spring, will take in so many goods, and cut carrying rates so low that the cost of living will be a great deal less.

Some machinery has been received here lately for shipment into the mines. A ball pulverizer fit for sampling can be set up at from $6,000 to $10,000. A stamp mill of from 10 to 15 stamps, with steam power, can be put into operation at a cost of from $10,000 to $12,000. The demand for all classes of mining machinery is going to be large. The principal purchases are made in Chicago; and some also have been made in New-York and Brooklyn. In buying such machinery and other wares, those miners who have made a good thing the past season need not be told to "cash their bills;" that is not the expression in the hills; they "weigh out" in settlement of all their accounts, the dust in their buckskin pouches being the currency of the realm. The Black Hills diggings are the only places in the country where greenbacks are worth more than gold. An ounce of the latter, worth $20, will bring only $17 50 in greenbacks. The coming stampede may serve to regulate market prices and inaugurate a different financial basis; however this may be, it is certain that the exciting rush for the new diggings is going to be the great event of the present year; and the mixed politics of the Presidential campaign, at last nearing a settlement, will be all forgotten by the throng of gold hunters in whose mind's eye "rich finds," nuggets, and pay streaks are of absorbing importance.

UTILIZING CARRIER PIGEONS.

THE DIFFERENT SPECIES—THEIR POWERS OF VISION AND MEMORY—STEAM-SHIP COMPANIES INCLINED TO USE THEM.

The project of using carrier pigeons as a means of communication between vessels at sea, and their ports of destination and departure, has received much consideration by various steam-ship companies, and it is probable that these birds will be introduced on board many of the steamers plying between this port and foreign lands during the coming year. The Transatlantic Steam-ship Company has already commenced the experiment in foreign ports, and it has thus far proved entirely successful. The company bought forty pairs of the best breed of Antwerp carriers two years ago, and divided them between this City, Fort de France, St. Thomas, and St. Nazaire, and established a central loft in the latter port. As it takes four years for a carrier to arrive at maturity, the success of the enterprise has not yet been demonstrated in this country. There are four varieties of high-bred pigeons, the pouter, Antwerp carrier, short-faced tumbler, and barb. Of these, the only breed which can be utilized as a dispatch-bearer, is the Antwerp carrier. A glance at the physical construction of these birds will readily demonstrate this fact. The pouter is the largest of the several varieties, the males being 19½ inches long from the end of the beak to the tip of the tail, while the legs, from the thigh joint to the tip of the middle toe, measure seven inches. The wings cover the legs and feet of these birds, and they have a wind-sack over their crops, which, when they feel in particularly high spirits, they expand to a considerable extent, and assume a pouting appearance, from which they derive their name. The short-faced tumbler is a small bird, not being more than 10 or 11 inches in length, from beak to tail, and its peculiarity consists in a round, prominent forehead, receding bull-finch beak, and small eyes. They have no wattles, either around the eyes or above the nose, and their powers of vision are not extended. The "barb" takes his name from an abbreviation of Barbary, where this species of pigeon was originally bred. This variety is of no practical use, and is bred purely for show purposes. These birds are very handsome and are much sought after by pigeon-fanciers. They are bred in five colors—black, yellow, white, dun, and red. Their beaks are short, and shaped like that of a bullfinch. Their heads are square and flat across the skull, and their eyes are large and encircled by wattles 1½ inches in diameter. The beak wattle of a matured bird of this species measure four inches in circumference. Although they possess large, prominent eyes, their power of sight is limited to a side view, and they are thus prevented from being rapid, high flyers. Mr. D. E. Newell has a large number of these birds at his columbary at the foot of West Nineteenth street, in this City, for some of which he paid exorbitant prices. At the pigeon exhibition in Baltimore, last month, Mr. Newell took three first premiums, and four second prizes, in eight entries, thus showing how near to perfection he has brought his birds. This species measures 14 inches from tip to tip. Lastly, there is the Antwerp carrier. The birds of this breed are sleek-looking, their feathers fitting them closely, and their general carriage may be likened unto that of a race-horse, upright and prominent. Their colors are blue, blue-checkered, and red-checkered. They have small wattles over the beak, but none around the eye, and their power of vision is keen and extended. The eye stands out boldly, and they are enabled to look straight ahead without moving the head from side to side, as is the case with other varieties of the carrier pigeon. Mr. Newell also has a columbary at Yonkers, where his father resides, and these gentlemen propose to utilize the carriers for transacting their business during the coming Summer between Yonkers and this City. Mr. Whitley, an Englishman, residing at Newark, New-Jersey, owns a number of the Antwerp carriers. He has already trained a number of birds to fly between his residence and Yonkers, and between this City and Newark. He trained his birds in three trials to make the distance between the two cities, and those birds which he has trained to fly from Newark to this City, accomplish the distance readily in 17 minutes. This gentleman states that the Antwerp birds are not at all inclined to seek roosting when flying, and that when released from confinement, they will, after becoming accustomed to the route, fly straight home. During the late Centennial Exposition at Philadelphia, an exhibitor of pigeons, living in Hoboken, accidentally liberated one of his finest specimens of the Antwerp carrier, but upon returning home on the following day he found the bird safely housed in its cote. An Antwerp bird may be taught in less than six months time to fly from 50 to 100 miles, as they appear to be endowed with a wonderful memory as well as keenness of vision, and having once traveled a route they never forget it.

A FEMALE THIEF.

ALBANY, Feb. 3.—Anna Reynolds, who said she belonged in New-Jersey, died from this city today, carrying with her a gold watch and chain, a gold necklace and chain, and a cross, valued altogether at $300, and $12 in money, the property of [illegible]. E. D. Sheldon.

THE SAVINGS BANKS.

TEN ADDITIONAL STATEMENTS.

ALBANY, Saturday, Feb. 3, 1877.

With but one exception the reports of all the City banks have been received at the Bank Department within the time specified by law, viz., Feb. 1. Some of these statements it has been necessary to send back for correction in minor details. The following 10 statements are additional to those already published. They include some of the largest as well as the smallest of the savings institutions of New-York. The reports are worthy of careful study. It is unnecessary to point out the relative standing of the several banks as here presented. The figures speak for themselves. Any one can see where investments are likely to be safe, and where they certainly cannot be. It will be observed that the oldest and wealthiest bank on the list pays the lowest rate of interest, while each of the several new and small ones pay 6 per cent.

A BOLD BURGLARY IN WHITE STREET.

At 6:30 o'clock on Friday evening an officer of the Fifth Precinct Police, while on patrol, found open the front door of the store No. 34 White street, occupied by James Wardlaw & Co., dry goods dealers. An examination of the premises was made, and it was found that a gang of burglars had visited and robbed the store. Mr. Wardlaw was summoned, and on looking over his stock found that goods valued at nearly $3,000, consisting chiefly of black silks, had been carried off. The store was closed for the night shortly before 6 o'clock, and it was apparent that immediately after the employes had left, the burglars had, with a "jimmy," wrenched off the padlock from the front door, and entering the store hurriedly, removed the goods from the shelves and placed them in an express wagon which was in waiting in front of the premises. The removal of the goods was effected in so systematic a manner that persons in the neighborhood who witnessed the operations of the burglars paid no attention to them, believing that they were the regular employes of the store at work later than usual. The burglary was reported at the Central Office yesterday, but no clue to the thieves or the property has been obtained.

A VAGRANT SENT TO PRISON.

For a long time previous to Thursday last a crippled boy, named Frank Heller, frequented Wall and Broad streets, and the lower part of Broadway, creeping on the walks in a painful manner, and by his deformities exciting the sympathies of passers-by, and thus procuring money. His parents were several times cautioned to keep him at home, but failed to do so. Mr. Haight, a member of the Society for Prevention of Cruelty to Children, procured his arrest on Thursday, and Justice Kilbreth committed him to the Juvenile Asylum as a vagrant. Yesterday he was again brought before the Justice, at the request of counsel employed by his father, and argument was made to prove that the cripple was not a vagrant and beggar. Mr. Lewis L. Delafield and E. L. Jenkins opposed the argument on behalf of the Society for Prevention of Cruelty to Children. Justice Kilbreth held that the boy was a beggar, though he never asked for alms, and committed him to the custody of the Commissioners of Charities and Correction.

CRUELTY TO A HORSE.

An aggravated case of cruelty to an animal was tried in the Court of Special Sessions yesterday, and ended in the conviction of the person charged with the offense. On the afternoon of Jan. 24, Jacob Raeder, a baker residing in Tremont, Westchester County, got drunk and drove his horse at a furious pace on Central Avenue. He then left the poor animal, covered with sweat, standing in the cold, without a covering, while he made a long stay in a hotel. An officer was called to look after the horse, who determined to drive the shivering beast to the Police station. Raeder, after some useless expostulation, jumped into the sleigh with the officer. While waiting for a railway train to pass the horse dropped dead. A post-mortem examination showed that its death was caused by a rupture of the pulmonary artery produced by over-exertion. Raeder was fined $25.

LAW REPORTS.

THE TAYLOR ESTATE.

CREDITORS ENDEAVORING TO GET A PORTION OF THEIR CLAIMS—A MOTION TO SET ASIDE LAWYERS' FEES.

Surrogate Calvin rendered a decision yesterday on the motion of the creditors of the estate of the late James B. Taylor to set aside the allowance of the large claims of the lawyers connected with the case. It appears that among the claims on the estate are a large number of "preferred claims" for services rendered by lawyers, the payment of which would entirely absorb the estate, greatly reduced by shrinkage and mismanagement, and now only amounting to about $200,000. These lawyers' claims were all allowed by the Referee of the estate some years ago, but upon the presentation of his report to the Surrogate's Court, the creditors excepted and appealed to the Supreme Court in Utica. The argument on the exception was heard by Judge Merwin, who filed a decision, in which he stated that he would not allow the large claims of the lawyers, but added that, though he would not allow them, he could not reject them entirely, owing to the provisions of certain special laws affecting the Surrogate's Court of the County of New-York. Each lawyer produced an order, from Surrogate Hutchings, who was in office at this stage of the case, directing the payment of the claims. These orders were held by Judge Merwin to have been made without jurisdiction, but being obliged to assume, on account of the existence of the above-mentioned special statutes, which provided that the exception of want of jurisdiction should not be taken to the orders of the Surrogate excepting by appeal or on proceeding before the Surrogate to vacate, set aside, or open or modify the same, that they were made by the authority of law, he directed the Receiver to apply to Surrogate Calvin to vacate them, the time for appeal having expired.

Application was accordingly made to vacate the orders, but was denied by Surrogate Calvin, who refused to disturb the orders of his predecessor. Henry L. Clinton, Senators Conkling and Kernan, and the other lawyers interested thereupon applied for a new order directing the payment of their claims.

In the meantime the New-York creditors of the estate became convinced of the necessity of taking steps to set aside the orders for allowances, in order to secure their interests. Examination of the records was accordingly instituted, and revealed the fact that the allowances were such as Surrogate Hutchings had no authority to make, except upon the final settlement of the Executor's accounts, and also that Receiver Bentley had neglected to set forth in his order before Surrogate Calvin to vacate the allowances the material facts showing the invalidity of Surrogate Hutchings' order. After examination of the papers, counsel for the Irving Bank of New-York, one of the creditors, made a new application to Surrogate Calvin to vacate the allowances, at the same setting forth the grounds upon which the order was invalid. Argument upon the application was heard by Surrogate Calvin on Jan. 22, his decision being rendered yesterday. In the decision he denied the application upon the grounds that the denial of similar motions by the Receiver were res adjudicata, and that a creditor had no standing in court excepting in the person of the Receiver. The Irving Bank intends to appeal from the decision, and has given notice of its intention to be heard by Judge Merwin, in Utica, on Monday next, that the Receiver be directed to set forth in such new motion—what he omitted to do in his previous proceedings—all the facts upon which the invalidity of the allowances depends. If his motion to appeal shall again be denied by Surrogate Calvin, the case will then be taken to the Supreme Court, and, if necessary, to the Court of Appeals.

NON-PAYMENT OF ALIMONY.

Peter Reuter, who is confined in Ludlow Street Jail for non-payment of alimony in divorce proceedings, instituted against him by his wife Elizabeth, was before Judge Donohue yesterday in habeas corpus proceedings, in which his discharge was sought on the grounds of his inability to pay alimony, and that his imprisonment was a mere act of malice on the part of his wife. Col. Spencer, who appeared for Reuter, said that on the 31st of January, 1870, an order had been issued requiring Reuter to pay $15 a week alimony pending the issue of the divorce suit, in which no proceedings have been had by the wife to bring it to a conclusion, her main desire being to keep her husband in jail. The alimony now claimed as due, being for 307 weeks, amounted to $4,605, which sum it was impossible for Reuter to pay. He had been confined seven months, and, in addition to the charge of disobeying the order requiring payment of alimony, he had been charged with abandonment. Counsel for Mrs. Reuter said that Reuter had heartlessly abandoned his wife and children, had married again, and had roamed all over the United States and New-Jersey. In fact, Mr. Reuter He was an "artful dodger," and was now playing a shrewd, sharp game. He was a manufacturing jeweler of abundant means, and was now supporting another woman and children by her, while he had left his own wife and family to starve. His idea was to plead poverty and long imprisonment in the hope of working on the sympathy of the court and securing his discharge without being compelled to pay the alimony due. Judge Donohue reserved his decision.

AN ORDER OF ARREST.

José A. Obrigon sent, in April, 1875, an American gold draft for $12,000 from Bogota, South America, to Juan C. De Mier, of this City, to purchase and ship to his order five silver bars. This order was countermanded, and De Mier directed to pay himself $1,100 out of the draft and send the balances to a firm in Paris, on whom the draft was drawn at 60 days. De Mier accepted the draft, drew the money, and failed, and in a suit brought against him by Obrigon in the Court of Common Pleas an order of arrest was procured against him, which both Judges Van Brunt and Robinson refused to vacate. On the trial of the case, the defense was that the draft was paid by De Mier by his acceptance of it, he being liable therefor to the Parisian firm. Judgment was given for Obrigon, De Mier having first moved to amend the complaint by striking out the allegation that the draft was obtained by him in a fiduciary capacity. Judge Van Hoesen granted the motion, holding that there was no fiduciary relation, because Obrigon supposed De Mier would use the money, for by drawing at 60 days' sight he gave De Mier 60 days within which to make arrangements for the payment of the money. The Parisian firm charged interest on the money, which he would not have done had he regarded it as a special deposit which De Mier could not use. The case is remarkable, from the fact that De Mier is liable to be imprisoned on an execution against his person, (as the order of arrest cannot be vacated after judgment,) notwithstanding the Judge before whom the case was heard holds that it is not a proper one for process against the debtor's person.

LIABILITIES OF COMMISSION AGENTS.

Felipe Fuentes & Co. shipped 27 bales of tobacco from Cuba to José de la Rosa Mayorga, of this City, to be sold by him on their account. Mayorga failed to remit the proceeds, and was arrested. On a trial of the case before Judge Van Hoesen, in the Court of Common Pleas, he directed a verdict for plaintiffs, because the answer did not deny the allegations of the complaint, it simply reciting that José Hertemendia, one of the plaintiffs' firm, had come to this City and insisted on payment, which had been refused by Mayorga until a full adjustment was had, whereupon Hertemendia got an injunction against Mayorga, destroying his business. A motion to vacate the order of arrest was denied by Judge Van Hoesen yesterday. The motion was upon plaintiffs' own papers, showing that after paying commissions and charges, defendant was to pay over the remainder, about $1,300, which he refused to do. Judge Van Hoesen refused to vacate the order, saying that an agent is at liberty to show, if he can, by the previous course of dealings between himself and his principal, or by other evidence, that he was permitted to use the money for which the goods were sold, and that the principal trusted him in the belief that his means would enable him to restore whatever he might take from the fund received for the goods. He gives the defendant leave to renew the motion to vacate on affidavits, though he thinks his action at this stage of the case is without precedent.

A COUNSEL'S CLAIM.

In a suit instituted in 1870 by Francis McCotter against Abraham R. L. Norton and Cecilia A. Norton and others, the Nortons, after five years' litigation, succeeded in retaining possession of valuable real estate in Newtown, Long Island. Benjamin Blankman, who had been their counsel, and who alleges that he had not been paid for his services, sued his clients and recovered judgment for $3,500. An appeal was taken, and yesterday a motion was made before Judge Donohue, in Supreme Court, Chambers, for a stay of proceedings pending the appeal. This was vigorously opposed by Mr. Blankman, who characterized it as simply an attempt to hinder him from obtaining what he had just

The President's Message to Congress on the resumption of specie payments is, for the most part, able, practical, and timely. It points out, as has been frequently done in these columns, that the present time is singularly propitious for the passage of legislation designed to make United States notes equal to their face value in coin. The method proposed is the very simple and effective one which THE TIMES has advocated for years, viz., the funding of that portion of our paper money which cannot find profitable employment, and whose existence is the most potent factor in the depreciation of all the legal-tender circulation. The President recommends the immediate passage of a bill authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to issue 4 per cent. bonds with 40 years to run before maturity, which bonds are to be exchanged for legal-tender notes whenever presented in sums of $50 or any multiple thereof. The amount of the proposed issue of these bonds is restricted to $150,000,000, and it is recommended that they be made available for deposit in the United States Treasury by national banks, in the same way as bonds bearing a higher rate of interest.

There are two points in the Message which may tend to impair its otherwise good effect. The one is the hint that by keeping coin and bullion at home and thus adding the coin of the country to the circulating medium, we should secure "a healthy 'inflation' of a sound currency, to the great advantage of every legitimate business interest." If this point has any meaning at all it is a weak attempt to gild the pill of a practical measure of resumption so as to make it more palatable to the advocates of an increased volume of paper money. It is obvious that coin will not circulate side by side with paper money so long as the amount of paper in circulation is redundant, and it is equally obvious that it is only when the increased magnitude of business transactions calls for the use of a larger amount of the circulating medium than can be furnished by the notes left outstanding that coin will enter, to any appreciable amount, into the ordinary transactions of business. There can be no special objection to the President calling such a process a healthy inflation of the currency, only he should have been more careful to guard his meaning against misapprehension, and he should have been above the appearance of throwing a delusive sop to people whose opposition may be counted on in advance.

The other objectionable point in the Message is the recommendation that the limitation of the issue of subsidiary silver coin and fractional currency to $50,000,000 should be removed. That would be anything but a healthy inflation of the currency, since it would simply mean the introduction of a debased coinage, to drive out, to an extent proportioned to the amount of its issue and the channels opened for its use, the more valuable descriptions of money. It is of the very essence of a subsidiary coinage that the amount of its issue should be strictly limited, and if the President believes that the country can advantageously use more than fifty millions of silver change, he ought to have stated how much more. A bald recommendation for the repeal of the existing limitation of the volume of subsidiary coin is merely an encouragement to the schemes of the Silver Ring—a move to open the flood-gates of inflation with one hand, while shutting them down with the other. We fear there is but a slender prospect of any action being taken by the present Congress in the line of the President's main recommendation, and it is, unfortunately, true that if the Message were acted on, the hint about silver would receive a very liberal construction in both houses. However ardently the friends of resumption may desire a funding bill, they certainly do not want it if saddled with any of the projects of silver inflation which lie between an adhesion to the use of that metal as a strictly subsidiary coinage and its use as an unlimited legal-tender.

The simple question to be decided by the Electoral Commission is, who were the legally-appointed Electors of the State of Florida on the 6th of December last. It is plain from the arguments of Democratic counsel yesterday that the hopes of their party are centred on the chance of counting the Electoral vote of Florida for TILDEN, and that they have very little expectation of being allowed to go behind the vote of a State when the legally-constituted authorities of that State have never called the vote in question. Their reliance upon the Florida case consists in the fact that the newly-elected State Government of Florida did attempt to invalidate the decision arrived at in regard to the Electoral vote, and that, therefore, the Commission may fairly be called on to decide between two contradictory utterances of the voice of the State. To this argument the Republican reply is that the legally-constituted Electors placed on record a certain decision on the day prescribed in the Constitution and in accordance with the laws of the State. That decision could not possibly be revoked by any State authority, and is, therefore, on the theory of the Democrats themselves, not reviewable by any authority derived from Congress.

DAVID DUDLEY FIELD'S committee made a characteristic exhibition of partisan spite yesterday. A letter was produced which ex-Gov. WELLS, of Louisiana, had intrusted to MADDOX for delivery to Senator WEST, but which MADDOX had never delivered. Compared with some of the HEWITT-PELTON series of Oregon telegrams, the letter is a very innocent production, and, in any case, its writer was entitled to be heard in explanation of its meaning. Mr. WELLS was equally entitled to a hearing in regard to the assertions which a very scurvy set of rascals in Democratic pay had made against him. With the shallow cunning of a Tombs shyster, the counselor of the Erie swindlers thought otherwise, and the Democrats on the committee, as usual, agreed with him. So the Chairman of the Louisiana Returning Board was not only denied a hearing in his own defense, but he was also refused the slender privilege of having that refusal placed upon the record of the committee.

MR. TILDEN'S "REFORM" TACTICS.

It is as fair to judge a man by the agents he employs as by the company he keeps. Find a man who employs notorious scoundrels, with a full knowledge of their character, and gathers about him for the purposes of his business outcasts and adventurers of every degree, and you estimate him at once as unprincipled and as governed by no scruples save those which the law enforces. He may stand at the street corners and cry aloud for reform, but you know that he is a hypocrite and not to be trusted in any public or business relations. Mr. TILDEN belongs to this class. The standard of his own character as a perjured tax-payer, as a faithless trustee, as a scheming, unscrupulous politician, determined the character of the persons he gathered about him to buy and cheat his way into the Presidency. A regiment of bummers, officered by ex-Senator GWIN and Mr. COYLE, of Washington, guarded his interests at St. Louis. Mr. HEWITT was his conscience-keeper in New-York. Mr. SMITH M. WEED held a roving commission, and wandered about, under various names, using the Tilden cash where it would do the most good. The same instinctive sense of the fitness of things led Mr. TILDEN to select DAVID DUDLEY FIELD for the management of his case at Washington. There are honorable lawyers, who do their duty by their clients without surrendering their own integrity. These possess no recommendation in Mr. TILDEN'S eyes. Mr. FIELD'S distinction is of another sort. He is burdened with no nice appreciation of professional propriety. His connection with the Fisk and Gould frauds on the Erie stockholders laid the foundation of a fame which few need envy. His dexterity in using the Tammany Judges, and in perverting the forms of law to protect the rankest injustice, gave him a distinction altogether unique. His zeal in TWEED'S behalf was only measured by the size of TWEED'S purse. In short, all the general public to-day know of Mr. FIELD is that he is invariably singled out to conduct cases which lawyers of different standing would not touch, and that he justifies the selection by the employment of methods worthy of the cause to be served. It is proper, therefore, that he should now appear as Mr. TILDEN'S chief agent in the proceedings of a House committee, and as his chief "objector" before the Electoral Commission.

But the most dexterous lawyer requires assistants. He knows what he wants and they supply it. The business is not a pretty one on either side, but the lawyer must have witnesses or he is powerless. As one is, so are the others. Given FIELD as the legal agent of Mr. TILDEN in the prosecution of the Louisiana case, and PICKETT, MADDOX, and LITTLEFIELD might all have been sketched in advance. PICKETT is FIELD modified by circumstances. Perhaps PICKETT might be more correctly described as a cross between TILDEN and FIELD. He has their fine appreciation of morality in the abstract and their contempt for it as a practical influence. He is willing to lie for a patriotic purpose, and to pocket ill-gotten gains in order that he may shine as a philanthropist. MADDOX, his associate, has similar characteristics. They are model Democratic witnesses. Both have a history, and it is not a savory one. They have played many parts, and none of them commends itself to honest folk. Those who know them declare they would not believe them on their oaths, and those who know them only by their own testimony comprehend their inability to distinguish between right and wrong. If we are to suppose that they conceived the idea of buying the Louisiana board, subject to a princely percentage for their trouble, the inference is inevitable that however much they mistook the quality of Messrs. WELLS and ANDERSON, they correctly understood the position occupied by Messrs. HEWITT and MORRISSEY, as financial agents of Mr. TILDEN. On the other hand, if we assume that MADDOX and PICKETT were chosen agents of the Democratic Party, to whom was intrusted the task of obtaining the Louisiana votes, if need be at the cost of a million, we must give the managers of the party credit for sagacity in the interpretation of character. MORRISSEY and MADDOX, PICKETT and HEWITT—they are noble brethren, all of them. Their moral natures were cast in the same mold. They hold that bribery was a legitimate means of securing the required vote for the Democratic candidate. PICKETT'S trouble was that the vote could not be bought in Louisiana; and MORRISSEY'S willingness to buy was checked only by the belief that the Grover trick in Oregon rendered further effort unnecessary. Mr. FIELD must have felt quite happy with PICKETT and MADDOX as witnesses. They are gentlemen after his own heart—ready for anything that may be required of them in the combined interests of virtue and the Democratic Party. The misfortune for TILDEN and Reform is that as witnesses they are not believed. The more they swear the more we know that they are lying.

Although the Oregon case lacks the raciness of the Louisiana exposure, it is strikingly suggestive of the Tilden tactics. Everywhere they were the same. Money—money—money. That was Mr. TILDEN'S constant argument for establishing his title to the Presidency. Testimony before the Senate Committee yesterday proved, by a comparison of handwriting, that the "Gobble" cipher addressed to TILDEN and the Patrick dispatch to PELTON proceeded from the same person. Both were PATRICK'S, who, as may be remembered, was sent from Nebraska as TILDEN'S confidential agent for securing a Democratic Elector in the place of WATTS. The CORSE and MILLER dispatches to PELTON, published yesterday, are equally significant. It is now evident that from the moment Mr. TILDEN discovered that he needed one vote, and that a chance existed of obtaining that vote from Oregon, no means were left untried to secure it. We have not only glimpses of the truth, but they tell of the corrupt use of money at every stage of the business. They are conclusive, too, as to the direct action of Mr. TILDEN in the matter. He and his nephew were the senders or the recipients of every suspicious message. They directed a base conspiracy from New-York, and they transmitted the money to render it successful. CRONIN is the result.

The crowning illustration of Democratic iniquity comes from Mississippi, and endangers the efficacy of the Tilden votes of that State. The Democratic President of a County Board of Registers yesterday testified to the Senate Committee that the Democratic judges of election, at each polling place in the county, were supplied with duplicate keys to the ballot boxes, for a purpose that may be imagined. "I suppose my idea was," the reluctant witness finally said, "that if there were too many Republican votes in the ballot-box, the key was to open the box that the Republican votes might be taken out and Democratic votes be substituted in their stead." The confession is made charming by its simplicity, and it illumines one of the ways that led to Democratic success in Mississippi.

SEWARD.

The publication of an autobiography and a memoir of WILLIAM H. SEWARD will vividly recall to the minds of our people the life and career of that eminent man. More than this, the artless narrative, enriched as it is, with a great number of familiar letters from SEWARD'S own hand, will present the statesman and politician to us as he only appeared to his most intimate friends. The world is never weary of the petty details which relate to the daily life and personal habits of its great men. It is an affectionate desire to clothe the conspicuous public man with the warmth of domesticity and with the common attributes of humanity, rather than a vulgar curiosity, which greedily absorbs information concerning his private life. And though no acute student of human nature can have implicit faith in an autobiography of even the sincerest of men, there is in such a work an inexhaustible fund of pleasure. It is pleasant, at least, to know what the writer was able and willing to write about himself.

To the student of politics the most attractive part of the life and letters of SEWARD will be that which relates to his early entrance into public life, and to his earlier career as a politician. The history of one phase of his career is necessarily the history of parties in this State. The record of another and a later era is a notable chapter in the political history of the Republic. But, after all, the majority of men will read with a certain fascinated interest of the boyhood and young manhood of SEWARD. Here we see the future statesman herding the cows, chopping the family fuel, and doing the family errands. He recalls, in the retirement of his venerable age, the happy Winter evenings, when the visit of a neighbor brought out the cider, nuts, and apples, and he heard fireside discourse on politics and religion. That his country-made clothes appeared awkward when he entered college, and thus compelled him to run in debt with a Schenectady tailor, was an important matter to young SEWARD. Because of that debt, which long rankled in his memory, he left college. His independence and courage served him well in this emergency, for, at the age of seventeen years, he sought and obtained the tutorship of an academy in Georgia. It was not a common character which could thus strike out such a bold path, and thus secure the confidence and friendship of strangers. And this achievement—for it was an achievement—was thoroughly characteristic of the man. It is pleasant, too, to look in upon the common concerns of life in which the young politician was interested. He thinks it worth while to tell his wife how the table is served at fashionable dinner parties in Albany, and he goes to the milliner's to buy for his wife and sister bonnets which he describes for them in the usual clumsy fashion of a man. There is no romance in his nature, but some sentiment and much tenderness. He writes charming little letters to his boys about their sports and their studies; and, away from home, he stands long at the window "looking at the sober moon," and thinking of his boys sleeping in their quiet chamber, far away, while the good mother writes to their absent father.

It was SEWARD'S fortune to enter public life when political parties were reforming. He was twenty-seven years old when he was sent to the State Senate as an Anti-Mason. In 1834, when he was thirty-three years old, the party in opposition to the Federal and State Administrations had assumed the name of "Whig." It is interesting to see how early the cardinal principles of SEWARD'S political life manifested themselves. His manly nature rose in indignation when he was first brought in contact with slavery. As soon as the question of foreign immigration attracted his attention, he was in favor of liberal naturalization laws. And, long before negro emancipation was dreamed of, he declared that he would give the ballot to every man, learned or unlearned, bond or free, though he should prefer that the school-master should precede the ballot-box. He early declared that universal education would be sure to follow universal suffrage. In 1844, he said that a preponderance given to the slave-holding States by the acquisition of Texas would be followed by demands which could not be yielded to and the denial of which would lead to secession and nullification. He was a steadfast champion of the State Militia system.

All this, however, is history. We are chiefly concerned with the personal details of SEWARD'S career. And it is easy to note the gradual formation of his political opinions, and the deepening of his political convictions, as events unfolded themselves. We cannot help seeing that SEWARD was affable and skillful in his management of men. But, under all his complaisance and deference, there was a hearty hatred of injustice, wrong, and chicane. He hated the Regency, and he hated the Democracy of JACKSON and VAN BUREN. When he went to see the former, while he was yet President, he could not suppress a sneer at the adulation bestowed upon "Old Hickory;" and he jumped at the conclusion that the President's head watch-guard was decorated with embroidered compliments. It is plain, too, that SEWARD was ambitious. He was determined to rise. When he first found himself on his feet in the Senate Chamber at Albany, his heart failed him, and "thick darkness," he says, was before him. The voice of the presiding officer filled him with consternation. When he had made his first speech, he was unable to recall a word which he had uttered. But he persevered, and those who knew the mature man little imagined what agonies of embarrassment he endured before he felt and wielded his full powers. It was part of his victory that the Whig Party, with which he had so often suffered defeat, triumphed at last in his election to the Governorship. This was his first grand success—the first of many which came after. It was characteristic of the man that, in the midst of the pomp and circumstance of the inauguration, he snatched an instant to write a note to his wife to say that he was in the executive chamber, and that the first formal ceremony was over.

SEWARD was wise, kind, and generous. No one can read his life and letters without being impressed with these personal traits. Mankind will deal more leniently with him when the innumerable private graces of his life are known. No man is less a hero because he is swayed by the prejudices or the sympathies which are common to humanity. Rather we resent an affectation of Spartan virtue which denudes a great man of his human warmth and leaves him chill as marble. Therefore, it is a good thing that, since we knew SEWARD to be the great man that he was, we should also be permitted to look into the mirror of his mind, to watch the unconscious revelations of his character. We shall like him all the better for it. He is dead, and his renown is a part of our national heritage. And though, in the lapse of years, he will be elevated higher in his niche of fame, he can never be to the people a cold abstraction, a marble statesman.

STATISTICS OF POPULATION.

Accuracy in geographical and statistical information is much to be desired. Great advances in this respect have been made within the last few years, but improvement is still possible. To geographers and statisticians the unknown was formerly the magnificent; it is not long since we were taught that Yeddo was the largest city in the world, and that China contained 600,000,000 of people. We have now before us the latest edition of a very excellent geography for the use of schools, published in this City, in which there are said to be only three cities in the world containing each one, or more than one, million of inhabitants, to wit: London, Paris, and Constantinople. But in fact there are nine, exclusive of New-York—London, with 3,489,428; Paris, 1,851,792; Constantinople, 1,075,000; Berlin, 1,045,000; Canton, 1,000,000; Vienna, 1,001,999; Seangtan, Shanchowfu, and Singanfu, in China, 1,000,000 each. There are also in the world 29 towns whose population is 500,000 or more; and 215 which contain 100,000 or more people. The total population of the world is placed in the geography to which we refer at 1,361,196,351, and the area of its land surface at 52,204,848 square miles; but in point of fact the population is 1,423,917,000, and the area 51,340,800 square miles—thus showing a trifling error in population of 62,720,649, and in area of 864,048 miles. We hasten, however, to reveal the source of our superior information. Four years ago two learned and painstaking Germans, Drs. BEHM and WAGNER, commenced the publication of a statistical work on the population of the earth, and they have each year published a new edition of their book, revised and corrected up to date. The fourth edition of this valuable work has recently appeared, and we have taken from it the facts stated above. The average density of population throughout the world is 28 persons to each square mile. In Europe the people are so crowded that 82 of them live on each square mile, or more than eight on each acre; while in Australia and Polynesia, if the land were equally divided, every man, woman, and child would have almost a square mile to his or her self. In Asia there are 48 persons to each square mile; in Africa, 17½; and in America, North and South together, 5½. When the whole earth becomes as densely populated as Europe now is, the descendants of ADAM and EVE will number 4,209,945,600 souls. According to our German authorities, Europe has 309,178,300 inhabitants; Asia, 824,548,500; Africa, 199,921,600; America, 85,519,800; and Australia and Polynesia, 4,748,600. The following table will show what is the population of the various countries of Europe according to the latest information obtained by our German authors. In this table the date following the name of the country indicates the year in which the data were obtained on which Drs. BEHM and WAGNER have based their figures:

Germany	1875	42,733,242
Austro-Hungary	1876	37,700,000
Switzerland	1870	2,669,147
Netherlands	1875	3,809,527
Belgium	1874	5,336,634
Luxemburg	1875	205,158
Russia	1870	71,730,930
Sweden	1875	4,383,291
Norway	1875	1,802,882
Denmark	1876	1,963 000
France	1872	36 102.921
Great Britain	1876	33,450,000
Spain	1870	16,551,647
Andorra	——	12.000
Portugal	1874	4,298,881
Italy	1875	27,482.174
Monaco	1873	5,741
San Marino	1874	7,816
European Turkey	——	8,500,000
Roumania	1873	5,073,000
Servia	1875	1,327,088
Montenegro	——	190.000
Greece	1870	1,457,894

Since 1871 the population of Germany has increased by 1,693,762; Norway has increased about 12,000 since 1875; Great Britain, 352,000 since 1875, and Portugal 378,681 since 1871; but it must be understood that in the case of Portugal this apparent increase is due chiefly to rectifications made in former estimates of her population. The population of the whole of the Turkish Empire is 47,660,000; that of the whole Russian Empire is 86,586,000. The population of China is 405,000,000, and of Japan, 33,299,014. With regard to America the population of Mexico is placed at 9,276,079, a larger number than we have before seen credited to that country. Central America, 2,828,164; the West Indies, 4,316,178; Brazil, 11,000,000, and all the rest of South America, 15,309,700.

THE MISCHIEF OF PRIVATE LETTERS.

POPE tells us that Heaven first taught letters for some wretch's aid—some banished lover or some captive maid. But, considering the incalculable amount of mischief they have caused, we should be justified in believing that letters were inspired by a region of a wholly different sort. It would seem that half the disappointments and woes of the nineteenth century come directly or indirectly from correspondence of some kind, generally from the kind called private. BYRON used to say that his private and confidential letters were better known than his published works, and that, when he marked what he wrote as private, he was sure of its wide circulation. BYRON'S correspondence with and from his friends and acquaintances was not materially different, in this regard, from the correspondence of other noted and clever persons.

Marking a letter private nowadays is merely a delicate and round-about way of whetting curiosity as to its contents, and of enhancing its interest. All that privacy commonly means in correspondence is that it shall not be printed. The receipt of a private letter is pleasant and desirable because it gives the receiver an opportunity to show it to all his friends—a very elastic substantive, including everybody not known to be a positive enemy—and so to borrow for himself a certain lustre from the nature of its import or the ingenuity of its statement. Only one kind of correspondence has more readers than private correspondence: that is the strictly private kind.

In this time we all dwell more or less under the open sky. Our interest in humanity is such that whatever concerns our fellows is presumed to concern us. We are particularly desirous to know what we feel we have no business to know, and the thing intended for one eye alone all eyes are strained to see. To learn that any bit of manuscript was not designed for publication makes us anxious to read it; for we fancy that it may then express some real truth, of which we get so little that we are always hungry for it. It is this feeling that makes private correspondence so attractive, and prevents it from being private in any restricted sense. The attractiveness is increased by the quality of the writing and the position or consequence of the writer. Nobody cares much about plain John Doe's or commonplace Richard Roe's missives, detailing the excellence of Mrs. Doe's health or the ailments of Mrs. Roe's numerous offspring. They are prosaic folks, with prosaic needs and prosaic surroundings. But if the adult members of either family will do something that they ought not to—if John Doe will rob his neighbor, or attempt to poison him; or if Mrs. Roe will fall in love with any other man than her husband, and describe the sin, temptation, or passion on paper—any number of people will be delighted with the description. It may be put in disordered English; the words may be vilely spelled; but such is the exciting effect of wrong-doing, even in disjointed syntax, that it will be ardently conned.

It is by no means necessary, however, for persons of culture or influence to violate any commandment or law to gain abundant readers for their private correspondence. Almost anything they may mention—insignificant though it be—will prove of interest. Particularization of their daily round, what they have had for dinner, whom they have seen, the words they have spoken, the ordinary opinions they hold—all this and much more of slight importance will be greedily devoured. And when they wander from the conventional, when they repeat gossip, when they criticise their acquaintances, when they confess imprudences, when they analyze themselves, when they trespass upon the forbidden—they are swinging boughs of luscious peaches over the wall and expecting that nobody will touch the fruit. All persons of any preminence who write private letters which they are unwilling should be made public are guilty, to put it mildly, of the gravest indiscretion. Nevertheless, many men, even the shrewdest and most worldly-minded, and the majority of women, are perpetually entangling themselves in the meshes of confidential correspondence. We all admit, particularly women, that we cannot be too careful of what we write; and at the same time we write what can never be defended or palliated or explained away.

Good sense seems to desert the bulk of us if we dip into ink and proceed to private correspondence. Although knowing that there is no guarantee of privacy for what we say, we seldom fail to be astonished and shocked when we find, as we phrase it, that our confidence has been abused. There are almost daily instances of such abuse. Politicians who have trimmed and managed for years, who have plumed themselves on their cunning and adroit deceptions, are just on the eve of getting an office they have long hungered for, when a letter they had written years before, and totally forgotten, appears in a newspaper and defeats their ambitious hopes. A merchant brings an important suit, swears to various statements, and would secure judgment in his favor were it not for the resuscitation of some private correspondence of which he had no remembrance. A breach of promise case is tried, and the hoary defendant declares that it is an attempt to extort money. It would be so decided but for the production of certain amorous billets which plainly indicate that marriage was or should have been intended, and the venerable gallant is ordered to pay damages for toying with a battered heart. Action for divorce is begun, and long continued with very little ground, so far as evidence goes. The public declares it a palpable case of persecution, and such would be the legal judgment but for certain letters, supposed to have been destroyed, which are suddenly produced, telling their own story too plainly and too sadly to be denied. A man trusts a woman, or a woman a man, implicitly for years; their mutual confidence, sympathy, and love are eulogized and envied far and near. In the midst of their Eden a scrap of paper accidentally comes to light, and the angel with the flaming sword drives them out forever more.

BOY ADVENTURERS.

It will be in order now for the small boy of the period to be "kidnapped." There was so much tragic mystery about the disappearance of the Ross child, and there is still so much painful uncertainty in the case, that the children regarded the transaction as a terrible one. But the spirit of adventure is so strong in boys that the slightest possible encouragement kindles it to action. Here now, is a small boy who has, as he says, been enticed away from his school by a mysterious old gentleman who offered him a bright silver quarter (mark the realism of that coin) to go with him. The town is in an uproar over the missing child, when he returns with a captivating tale of his adventures. He has been in the toils of a local Fagin, and is bereft of his nice new overcoat. He was ordered by his captor, who seems to have been an escaped lunatic, to go out and pull garments from the front of a shop where they were exposed for sale. This he, like a good boy, refused to do, and then took to his heels, and was duly returned to his home, too late for the school session of that day. The lunatic old man has not yet been traced, and the young adventurer's tale is told in vain to baffled policemen.

What susceptible American youth, addicted to light literature, could withstand the fascination of such a voyage of discovery? A boy who has such a story of personal experiences to tell is the hero of the hour in the juvenile circle to which he belongs. Boys whose excursions have been confined to the next ward or, at furthest, to a trip to Coney Island, under the eye of a paternal guardian, look with unconcealed envy on a lad who has been abducted and has had actual conversation with a mysterious old gentleman who entices little boys with bright and new silver quarters. Boys who have not been abducted regard themselves as much misused; their lives will be wasted until they are kidnapped. If they could only have a hand-to-hand fight with Fagin, like a new Jack the Giant-killer, and then run away from their captor in company with a beautiful princess, they would be able to look down upon their humdrum companions as very "small potatoes" indeed. The result of all this boyish cogitation must be that there will be a hue-and-cry sent out for boys of ten or twelve years of age; and each one will bring back a more harrowing and wonderful tale than his predecessor. If the youthful adventurers do not find Fagins in Chatham street, ogres in the Bowery, and bearded pirates in the region of Corlear's Hook, it will not be because there are none there. It would not be surprising if some tender youth, who has conceived for one of his garments that unaccountable and unreasonable repugnance which boys sometimes manifest should come home from a six hours' confinement in a Broadway dungeon without any clothes worth mentioning.

The number of boys enticed into private excursions by the glories of the Centennial Exposition is beyond computation. Infants of tender years, hearing from their elders the usual glowing accounts of the great show, and denied permission and money, adventurously set out to beg or steal their way to Philadelphia. From all parts of the country there was a steady advance of fugitive urchins, each with his face set toward the great Exhibition. Such enterprise should merit encouragement; but it too often happened that the little adventurers stole money from their parents when no other resources offered themselves. But some of the more innocent and unsophisticated children stole softly out by the back gate, after breakfast, confident that they could go to Philadelphia, see the show, and return before the next night, subsisting meanwhile on a supply of carefully secreted ginger-cakes and such game as might be killed en route with the casual bow and arrow.

One boy has lately made his way alone from Boston to San Francisco, and has just been restored to his guardians. Another, from the interior of Holland, secreted himself on an out-going steamer and so took passage to New-York. A Baltimore lad, aged fourteen, who had made short excursions away from home, without leave, was lately killed while stealing a ride on a freight-car, near Altoona, Penn. This boy, it is said, had had his imagination inflamed with sensational reading, and had sallied forth, like a juvenile Don Quixote, in search of adventures. The cheap and flashy newspapers for young people are directly chargeable with many such tragical escapades as these. Most boys are venturesome and ready to join in any fool-hardy expedition or go off by themselves when the opportunity is presented. But the frivolous and sensational reading which is invented for the young only adds fuel to the flames. To this abominable stuff parents may fairly ascribe the restlessness their boys sometimes manifest. And the disgust with their common-place surroundings by which many youths make home unhappy is the natural results of a morbidly-developed appetite for adventure. Boys are imitative creatures, and the story of one lad's thrilling experience will inflame an entire neighborhood. Many a youngster has sallied out with a jacknife and shingling-hatchet, to be a pirate or highwayman, after hearing some frightful tale from The Pirate's Own Book, or juvenile newspaper. These excursions are usually harmless. The young would-be hero is brought back in disgrace and made to eat the bread of repentance with stripes under his jacket. But anxiety and alarm often pursue the young vagrants without finding them; and nobody can tell how many vagabonds are prematurely thrust upon the world by vicious reading and bad example.

EDUCATION FOR ALL.

Dr. HAYES has just presented a bill in the House which has an important bearing on the interests of education in this City. It is an act designed as an amendment of the Compulsory law. It is well known that this law, from which so much was expected in diminishing the ranks of the ignorant in this City, failed to a large degree of its purpose here on account of two or three words admitted in one section. Among those who should be compelled to enjoy the benefits of education, were apparently omitted, such children as were engaged in a "lawful occupation" in our streets. Now, in New-York, the illiterates and future members of the "dangerous classes" are made up, not alone of the strictly vagabond and street-wandering class, but of a vast number who have some nominal occupation. They are sellers of "black-headed pins," boot-blacks, newsboys, "baggage-smashers," little peddlers, crossing-sweepers, and the like. Among the Italian population alone, there are hundreds of children who are nominally employed all day as boot-blacks and attendants of organ-grinders. This numerous class of street children would grow up in entire ignorance but for the night schools provided by one charitable association—the Children's Aid Society. Still even these schools do not reach the whole class of children in street occupations. Many of these lads will not attend any school, except under compulsion. They are growing up in a condition extremely dangerous to the future of the City. The sixty thousand persons here who can neither read nor write are largely recruited from those youths who claim to have a "lawful occupation." It is such children who grow up to become our most ignorant voters, and who are the rich material from which mobs and rioters are formed.

Any legislation, however, in regard to them must consider certain well-known facts. It will not do to prevent these lads from following their street business. They supply legitimate wants in the community and support themselves or their families by their labor. To cut them off from this would be to turn workers into paupers. The amendment proposed by Mr. HAYES has full consideration for this. It requires that "when any child, whether having a lawful occupation or not, being mentally and physically competent, is yet unable to attend school, or his guardian or parent unable to have him attend," it shall be the duty of the school authorities to require him to attend in either a day or evening school such time as is "an equivalent to at least sixty days' school attendance." This amendment would require the officials of our Board of Education to compel all children engaged in street trades to attend a half-time or evening school for at least four months, as, in another section, two half-time sessions are made equal to one day session.

Four months of night-schooling would be no hardship to the little newsboys or boot-blacks. Few of them pursue their business at night. And even if in some occupations they are compelled by the greed of their parents to work in the evenings—as in the case of the little Italian harpers—it is for the public interest that they should be forced from this severe labor to places of education. Four months' night-schooling are already required in most of the street-boys' lodging-houses.

In Prussia, no child within a tender age is permitted to be absent from school, even for factory work, in certain hours. England is bringing more and more of the factory children under her Education acts. How much more necessity here to include the children who follow semi-vagrant occupations within our Educational laws. If, however, any of the members felt that this provision was too stringent, a clause could easily be added giving the School Trustees power to grant exceptions to the execution of this law in cases of extreme poverty, where the labor of a child in the evening was necessary to the support of a family. This power of exception might sometimes, in our villages, be important. The Legislature must remember that in the long run the character and success of this Metropolis will depend on the education of its people, and an utterly ignorant class, bred up in the streets, is a formidable danger to the order and security of the City, and a peril to our political future.

AN EXPLODED "TORPEDO."

ADVENTURES OF A "TURKISH NO-BLEMAN" IN NEW-YORK.

HOW A SOCIAL FRAUD IMPOSED ON THE HOTEL KEEPERS, STEAM-SHIP OWNERS, AND SHIP BROKERS OF THE METROPOLIS —FIVE MONTHS OF FEASTING AT EVERY-BODY'S EXPENSE—A TORPEDO BOAT THAT COST SIX MILLIONS—FINAL FLIT-TING OF THE TURCO-ITALIAN-CHINESE-CONFEDERATE REPRESENTATIVE TO FIELDS AND PASTURES NEW.

For months past a considerable portion of the New-York public have been more or less interested in the movements of a dashing naval gentleman of extensive military and financial experience, known to his friends as "Edinboro' Bey, Captain in the naval service of his Imperial Majesty the Sultan." The Captain, or "Colonel," as he was more generally termed, represented himself as standing high in the confidence of the Ottoman authorities, and as having been sent to this country on a delicate and important mission connected with the pending war between Russia and Turkey. For a while everything went on swimmingly. The "Colonel" was dined and wined by well-known New-Yorkers, introduced into society, and everywhere made himself the observed of all observers by his audacity, wit, and consequential bearing. Nobody suspected that he was not what he represented himself to be, and it is only a fortnight since that his sudden departure under peculiar circumstances aroused his friends to the true state of the case. For weeks the deluded associates of the "Bey" waited in silence, but without tidings of their quondam friend. At last the truth leaked out through various sources, and a state of things which the following letter but faintly indicates ensued:

WHO IS HE?

On the 5th of September last there was entered on the register of the New-York Hotel the name of "H. R. Edinboro', Constantinople." The party so registering claimed to be an officer employed by the Turkish Government, and to be visiting this country on business connected with the torpedo service. He was known to many gentlemen as "Torpedo Bey." He also pretended to have authority to charter ships for ex-Gov. Winchester, of the Winchester Repeating Arms Company, for shipments of arms and munitions of war to Constantinople, and visited the Governor at his home in New-Haven. He also pretended to be an important witness in the suit of Oscanyan against Winchester, in which the plaintiff claims a commission of some $250,000 for introducing the Winchester arms into Turkey while acting as Turkish Consul General in New-York. On the 31 day of January last "Col. Edinboro'" left the New-York Hotel without paying his board bill, or the money borrowed from confiding friends. On the 13th of the same he registered at the St. Omer Hotel in this City, as "Capt. H. B. Edinboro', New-Haven," stating that he had just returned from a visit to Gov. Winchester, his friend, and at the same time deposited with the proprietor of the hotel $3,000 in three $1,000 gold certificates, besides other money in bank-notes. Three days later he left the St. Omer, stating that he was going to Washington. Since that time he has not been heard from.

Description: About 5 feet 9 inches in height; weight 200 pounds or more; age about 40; bluish-gray eyes; light hair, full whiskers, both cut short.

I deem it my duty to the public in general, and to hotel keepers in particular, to warn them against this accomplished swindler and arrant impostor.

HIRAM CRANSTON.

NEW-YORK HOTEL, Saturday, Feb. 3, 1877.

The question of who is "Torpedo Bey," alias "Edinboro' Bey," alias "Capt. Edinboro', of the Turkish Navy," alias "Col. Edinboro'," of the "Confederate," "Peruvian," "Egyptian," "Chinese," and numberless other services, is one that might well puzzle the most astute of social gossips.

Capt. Edinboro', as he was then called, first became known to New-Yorkers and Anglo-Americans in general some three or four years ago. Gov. Winchester, of the Winchester Repeating Arms Company, met him in Constantinople in 1872, when he (the Captain) was attached to the Turkish Navy. In 1873, Edinboro' appeared at the Langham Hotel, in London, where he made the acquaintance of a large number of traveling Americans and created a great sensation. He wore a Turkish fez and naval uniform, and gave out that he had been sent from Constantinople to take charge of a Turkish iron-clad just completed on the Clyde, and bring her around to the Dardanelles. He was constantly boring his friends with invitations to come down and see his ship, and offered several of them free passage to Constantinople on her. He was quite intimate with Gen. R. S. Ripley, late of the Confederate service, and by him was introduced to a large number of Americans—among others to Col. Howard Fuller, of the London Cosmopolitan, and to Hon. Charles D. Poston, ex delegate to Congress from Arizona, both of whom are now in this City. While in London, Col. Edinboro' was sometimes seen in the companionship of a beautiful woman whom he called his wife, but oftener in the society of Spears & Pond's beauties. (Spears & Pond are the lessees of the "Criterion" and other well-known places of resort in London, and are noted for the handsome bar-maids in their employ.) Edinboro' pretended to be a Virginian by birth, and said that he had been an officer in the Confederate Army during the war. He had also, he said, served in the Chilian Army, and under Garibaldi in Italy, and had afterward gone to Turkey. His distingué air and generally "stunning" appearance had its effect on the circles in which he moved, and he found no difficulty in effecting loans whenever he wanted ready money. Among his other victims was an English gentleman of whom he borrowed £600 ($3,000) on the shortest possible acquaintance. Mr. Goodenough, late United States Consul General in Constantinople, who knew Edinboro, in 1872 and 1873, says he left that city leaving, as his sole legacy, debts to landlady and other creditors who besieged the American Consulate for several days, endeavoring to obtain redress.

The Bey, having fought on the Confederate side, the good Ottomans fancied that the United States authorities were responsible for his debts, or at least bound to furnish some redress. In the meantime, Edinboro' had reached Marseilles and from thence proceeded to Paris and London. When he arrived in New-York, in August last, he announced himself as in charge of the Turkish torpedo service, and also as armed with special powers for the chartering of American vessels for transport purposes. He put up at the New-York Hotel in great style, and was treated with the consideration due to his assumed dignity. His numerous trunks all bore the Turkish arms in the shape of a glittering crescent and star, and among the loungers and hangers-on of the house he was looked upon as a Grand Vizier at least. His first move was to make the acquaintance of a number of ship-brokers and steam-ship owners, of whom he borrowed money in liberal sums, and promised to engage their vessels for the Sultan's service as soon as the necessary formalities could be concluded. He obtained large loans of Capt. Stead, of the steamer Professor Morse, on the understanding that his steamer would be among the first chartered. One cold, wet afternoon, he took the Captain several miles up the North River, in order to inspect a couple of steamers which he thought of hiring for his Majesty's service. After an unsuccessful search Stead returned late at night, worn out and covered with mud, without having been able to find two steamers which would suit the critical fancy of the "Bey." In order to obtain a Turkish engagement, the owners of the Morse refused a valuable private offer, and are altogether out of pocket by their confidence in "his Highness," to the amount of $2,000. Another promising negotiation of the "Bey" was with the owner of a celebrated submarine torpedo-boat which the Turkish representative offered to buy for $1,000,000 (Turkish funds, ($6,000,000 in gold,) and which would "effectually protect the Dardanelles against the combined navies of the world." Among ship-brokers of William street and the Maritime Exchange the "Colonel" was an object of admiration and envy. Everywhere he was followed by half a dozen enterprising brokers, offering to loan him money to any amount and begging him to engage their ships for the transport of arms and munitions to Constantinople. Among the stories he told to his society friends were some which would have done credit to Munchausen himself. One was that Senator Jones, of Nevada, had offered him $25,000 a year to introduce a new ice patent in India, and for two months he kept an unfortunate civil engineer named Brown hanging around the hotel, in the promise of being engaged by the "Bey" to introduce the blessings of ice among the benighted nations of India. His hotel bill was rendered promptly every week, but nobody thought of pressing so magnificent an individual for payment.

On one occasion when the "Colonel" was returning from a yachting excursion with Mr. F. W. J. Hurst, of the National Line, he told Mr. Cranston that he had been knocked overboard during the cruise, and had, unfortunately, lost his commission, credentials, check-book, ready money, &c. It afterward turned out that he had been on a yachting trip with the gentleman in question—without, however, being knocked overboard in the manner described. At last the authorities of the New-York Hotel were compelled to use plain language with the "Bey," but the owners of the torpedo-boat and others who expected fat contracts from the Turkish Government interceded, and matters were smoothed over for a time. On the day after New-Year's the Colonel-Bey or the Bey-Colonel, whichever the reader chooses to call him, left the New-York Hotel and an unliquited board bill of over $600, for a visit to Gov. Winchester, at New-Haven, Conn. What happened during his absence is not known, except the fact that while he had left the City in straitened circumstances he returned quite "flush." He stopped at the St. Omer Hotel, in Sixth avenue, where he left, as already stated, several thousand dollars in gold certificates and notes in the hands of the proprietor. On the same day he visited Mr. R. C. Edwards, agent of the Winchester Repeating Arms Company, in Barclay street, and asked him to cash a draft for $600 in gold on the Bank of New-York. Mr. Edwards did so, and handed him two $100 bills, $100 in $5 and $10 bills, $16 in notes of smaller denominations, and the balance, $300, in gold. He told Mr. Edwards that he was going to leave for London that afternoon on the steamer Denmark, adding that the ship possibly might not sail. Mr. Edwards looked in THE TIMES of the next day, but did not see his Turkish friend's name among the list of passengers. On the Monday following the "Colonel-Bey" was entertained at Delmonico's at a dinner given in his honor by the expectant ship-brokers. On Tuesday, the 16th, he paid his bill at the St. Omer Hotel, and decamped, taking the $3,000 in gold certificates already alluded to, and a large sum in greenbacks. It is rumored that the secret of the "Colonel's" sudden wealth is the fact that he is possessed of important facts concerning the law-suit mentioned in Mr. Cranstown's letter, and that certain parties are willing to bleed liberally in order to get rid of him. By the confession of all parties he has proved himself, during a short stay of five months, one of the most adroit and accomplished adventurers that the Metropolis has ever entertained. Even the gentlemen who have suffered most by him cannot help expressing their admiration of the fellow's unanimity, audacious impudence, and Arabian Night's-like imagination. To those who saw him last, he stated that his destination was Washington, but it is generally thought that he has returned to London or Paris. His greatest mourners are the ship-brokers, among whom he is affectionately referred to as "Torpedo Bey," and whose ships are now lying idle at the wharfs awaiting the next arrival from Constantinople.

YALE REFUSES TO MEET CORNELL.

A BOATING CHALLENGE REJECTED—WHY IT WAS NOT ACCEPTED—THE FOOT-BALL PLAYERS ALSO DECLINE TO MEET COMPETITORS.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

NEW-HAVEN, Feb. 3.—At a meeting of the Yale University Boat Club held this afternoon, President Davis presiding, and a large number of students attending, it was voted to reject Cornell's challenge to row a four-mile straight-away race in an eight-oared boat with coxswain, or in a four-oared boat without coxswain, should Yale be the victor in the race with Harvard. The ground for declination is that Cornell refused to pull a race with Yale at Philadelphia, after the objection of a lack of funds had been overcome by the offer of New-York graduates to pay all expenses, and that, consequently, Cornell acted in bad faith. The finances of the Yale Club were declared by Capt. Collin to be in a bad condition, and it was stated that subscriptions must be had to enable the crew to perfect their training for the Harvard contest.

At a meeting of the Foot-ball Association, immediately following the boating meeting, it was voted not to join the Intercollegiate Association, the Yale Club not wishing to be controlled by rules other than those they are able to agree upon in each match with contestants.

SERIOUS PANIC IN A CHURCH.

A LARGE CONGREGATION OF METHODISTS IN GREAT DANGER—HOW THE EXCITEMENT WAS CREATED.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

CINCINNATI, Feb. 3.—While a large congregation was assembled in the Methodist church at East Columbia, a night or two since, the people were suddenly startled by a great crash at the east side of the church. It was supposed that the building was about to be carried down the hill by a landslide, and immediately a panic ensued. A cry of fire was raised, which added to the confusion. Women fainted, and several men were injured in their attempts to break the windows, and afford exit for the panic-stricken people. The cause of the accident was found to be the fall of a retaining wall, which, in its descent, struck against the side of the church. The panic was allayed before serious injury was done, but it was found necessary to adjourn the meeting.

A CHRISTIAN CONFERENCE.

UNDER THE AUSPICES OF THE ST. LOUIS YOUNG MEN'S CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATION—THE LABORS AND GROWTH OF THE ASSOCIATION IN AMERICA.

ST. LOUIS, Feb. 3.—A Christian Conference under the auspices of the Young Men's Christian Association has been in session here for two days, and several prominent gentlemen engaged in Christian work from different parts of the country are present, among them Rev. Geo. N. Hall, late Secretary of the New-York Association; Thomas K. Cree, traveling Secretary of the International Executive Committee of the United States and Canada; R. Weidensal, traveling agent of the International Committee in the North-west; A. W. Van Arsdale, General Secretary of the Young Men's Christian Association, of Chicago, and others. A number of addresses on various subjects of interest to those engaged in this work have been delivered and discussed, and a great deal of interest has been manifested in the exercises of the session, both day and evening. Mr. Cree presented a report setting forth the labors of the Young Men's Christian Association, and its growth and influence. It shows that notwithstanding the depressed state of business, there has been a healthy increase of associations all over the country, and they have been unusually active. The total number of associations connected with the International Committee, is 1,060. The buildings and property owned, exclusive of libraries, furnitures, &c., are valued at $2,200,000. Current expenses for the year, $450,000. There are 120 general secretaries, who give all their time to Association work, and the membership of the Association is about 100,000. Employment was found during the year for over 10,000 men. Twenty-one State and Provincial conventions have been held during the year, at which 416 Associations were represented. The growth of associations in the South has been very marked, about 200 having been organized since the last annual visit to that section of the country, and active work is being prosecuted there among the colored young men.

THE WEATHER.

INDICATIONS.

THE PROPOSED DARIEN CANAL.

PANAMA, Jan. 25.—The Star and Herald of Jan. 18 says: "The news just received from the Canal Exploring Expedition in the Darien could not be more flattering in all that concerns the progress of the work. Mr. Wyse, the chief in command, had, in advance of the body of the expedition, crossed the summit and arrived on the Atlantic slope. The observations which he had been able to make during this excursion had redoubled his hope of a result extremely favorable to the adoption of that route as suitable for the construction of the proposed canal. The sanitary condition of the expedition in general could not be better, notwithstanding the lamented death of Capt. Bixio. This unfortunate occurrence was not in any way due to the peculiarities of the climate of that region, but to circumstances which might have occurred in any other."

THE MOBILE AND OHIO RAILROAD.

MOBILE, Feb. 3.—The United States Circuit Court for the Fifth Circuit and Southern District of Alabama, Hon. John Bruce presiding, has this day rendered a decree affirming the title of Morris Ketchum as Trustee under the first mortgage of the Mobile and Ohio Railroad Company. The opinion is very elaborate, and will be published in a few days.

LYNCHING IN ARKANSAS.

LITTLE ROCK, Feb. 3.—The DeWitt (Arkansas County,) Indicator publishes the details of the lynching in Stanley Township of Frank J. Astor a few days ago. Astor was taken from his home, without clothing, by a party of men, and hung to the limb of a tree. The cause for the deed is unknown.

CONVICTED OF RECEIVING STOLEN BONDS.

BOSTON, Feb. 3.—Guilford White, an attorney at law, of this city, who has been on trial for the past week, was this evening found guilty of receiving two stolen United States bonds of $10,000 each.

AMUSEMENTS.

MUSICAL AND DRAMATIC.

ENGLISH OPERA.

"The Bohemian Girl" was sung at the Academy of Music, yesterday afternoon, Miss Kellogg as Arline bearing off her usual allowance of laurels, and her associates uniting in a general performance of sustained interest and merit. Tomorrow, the company is to enter upon the third and final week of their sojourn in this City, and, as we shall probably be sans opera for a good many months thereafter, it is to be hoped that at least as liberal encouragement as the public has accorded their performances thus far will be bestowed upon the last of the series. Tuesday—instead of Monday—"Lucia" will be given, with Miss Kellogg, Mr. Maas and Mr. Carleton in the principal rôles; Wednesday, "The Flying Dutchman" may be listened to, and, on Friday, "Mignon" will be represented for the benefit of Miss Kellogg. The opera intended for interpretation at the proposed Saturday matinée, will be determined upon hereafter.

THOMAS' SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The fourth symphony concert given by Mr. Thomas, this season, took place at Steinway Hall, yesterday evening, in presence of an immense audience. The programme occupied two hours in its interpretation, and was unusually substantial. It included Bach's Suite No. 3 in D, Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony, and some new music from "Götterdämmerung," the fourth and last work of the Wagnerian cyclus. The performance was absolutely faultless. The second division of the Suite—which is also the most familiar—exhibited in the strongest light the admirably-delicate work of Mr. Thomas' violins, and the interpretation of the whole composition left nothing to be wished for. Still more sympathetic and precise execution was noticeable in the "Pastoral" symphony, with its alternation of suggestive and imitative passages, and its well-nigh endless variety of lovely tone-pictures, the allegro being followed by a special demonstration of delight on the part of the spectators. The music from "Götterdämmerung" constituted the last half of the concert. This included the funeral march sounded as Siegfried's corpse is borne toward the castle of the Gibichungs, the subsequent lament of Brünnhilde, and the complete finale. Our opinion as to the impressiveness of excerpts from Wagner's operas has been repeatedly expressed in this place. The weird beauty of the composer's themes and the splendor of the orchestration are too apparent not to have recognition at once, but the writing loses all its significance when the antecedent scenes its motives recall to listeners familiar with the trilogy are not suggested, and when rich scenic effects are not at hand to instruct and entrance the eye while the voices and instruments fills the ear. To the fortunate few who visited Bayreuth last Summer, the second part of yesterday's concert was fraught with a strange but genuine eloquence. The eventful epochs of Siegfried's life were summoned before them again in the broken phrases of the funeral march, and, while Brünnhilde's impassioned accents rose above the ocean-like swell of the orchestra, the sweet utterances of the love duet, the rising of the flames at Loge's bidding, the martial summons typical of the Wälsungs, the wild calls of the Walkyries, and the grave harmonies suggestive of Walhalla brought back every incident of the noble drama. We cannot believe, however, that the selections addressed themselves with equal power to the public, and, though the massiveness and elaborateness of the music were not to be mistaken, we are constrained to think that the plaudits were intended rather for the performers than for the composition. Mr. Thomas' forces, it must be said, went through their difficult task with unflagging zeal, and Mme. Pappenheim, who personated Brünnhilde, sang wholly from memory, and with a warmth and energy worthy of unreserved commendation. The tempo of the march appeared to us as taken rather slow, but as Mr. Thomas usually has authority for his performances, we should not like to be too positive on this point.

AN ATTRACTIVE CONCERT.

An entertainment of rare excellence will be given at Steinway Hall on Tuesday evening, under the auspices of the New-York Press Club. The programme is to embrace both literary and musical elements. Mr. Samuel L. Clemens (Mark Twain) will read a sketch prepared especially for the occasion, and will give therein an account of his experience with an "interviewer." The musical and literary celebrities whose names follow are also to take part in the affair, the list including Mme. Eugenie Pappenheim, soprano; Mme. Zelda Seguin, contralto; Messrs. William Castle and George Werrenrath, tenors; Mr. William Carleton, baritone; Mr. Jules G. Lumbard, basso; Mr. Frederick Boscovitz, pianist; Mr. Charles Roberts, Jr., and Mr. A. P. Burbank, elocutionists; The New-York Madrigal and Glee Club, Mr. G. G. Rockwood, director; The Young Apollo Club, Mr. W. F. Williams, Director, and Signor E. Marzo, conductor and accompanist. This remarkable array of artists concerned in a single entertainment has caused a lively demand for seats, and the sales have been large; as many prominent citizens, too, have signified their intention of being present, it is expected the audience will be uncommonly representative. A few tickets with reserved seats can still be bought at Steinway Hall.

GENERAL MENTION.

Mr. Burbank will recite at Association Hall, on Tuesday evening.

"The Big Bonanza" is to be acted at the Olympic Theatre throughout this week.

"The Happy Moke" may still be witnessed at the San Francisco Minstrels' Opera-house.

A concert by the "Slave Troupe of Jubilee Singers" will be given at the Grand Opera-house this evening.

Mme. Essipoff is to give three concerts at Steinway Hall, occuring, respectively, on the evenings of Feb. 13 and 16, and on the afternoon of Feb. 17.

With the present week Mr. Booth's representations at the Brooklyn Academy of Music will terminate. Last week's performances, we learn, were very successful.

Miss Victorine Lubin, professionally known as "The Water Nymph," and Capt. Quigley, the celebrated diver, are to perform at the New-York Aquarium throughout this week.

Mr. H. J. Montague departs to-morrow on a "starring tour." He will visit successively Providence, Boston, and Buffalo, and will make known, during his trip, a new play called "Our Idol."

"Indian Life; or a Chase for a Wife," is the title of a "romantic sensational drama on horseback," which, with sundry trotting and running races, may be witnessed at Gilmore's Garden throughout this week.

A new "musical comedy," called "Marion, the Pretty Bonquetière," will be made known at the New Broadway Theatre, to-morrow evening. A concert by the Georgia Jubilee Singers will be given at the same house, to-night.

Mrs. Sheridan Shook repeated her excellent performance of Lady Teazle, with Mr. Bird as Sir Peter, at the Lyceum Theatre, last evening, the representation being given for the benefit of the Rosendale Mission, of Ulster County.

"La Jolie Parfumeuse" will be the attraction at the Eagle Theatre to-morrow evening, and, on Tuesday, "La Petite Mariée," an opera by Lecocq, new to American audiences, will be produced there, with Mlle. Aimée, of course, in the principal rôle.

Mr. Heller will change his programme to-morrow evening. The third entertainment at the Wonder Theatre is to embrace six new tricks, some novel features under the caption of "The Second Sight Mystery," and divers other good things.

Mr. Longfellow and his publishers have accorded to Mrs. Cosinne Young the right to use the story and title of "Evangeline" for that lady's new opera. It is soon to be produced two hear in Brussels and, subsequently, will be represented in Paris and London.

The last representations of "All for Her" are to occur at Wallack's Theatre to-morrow and Tuesday. On Wednesday "A Morning Call" and "Married Life" will constitute the programme, Mr. Wallack and the whole company being concerned in its representation.

Mr. George Fawcett Rowe's new drama entitled "Fifth Avenue" will be produced at Booth's Theatre to-morrow evening. Mr. Rignold and several well known artists are to take part in the performance, and the impressiveness of the play will be further enhanced by a mise en scène of rare elaborateness.

"Our Boarding House" appears to have produced a durable as well as a pleasant impression. The audience at the Park Theatre, last evening, was so large that the musicians were sent into exile—no very serious mishap, by the way—while eager spectators invaded the orchestra. The piece is announced for nightly repetition.

A concert for the benefit of the Italian Protestant Episcopal Church will be given at Steinway Hall, on Wednesday evening next. Among the performers who have tendered their services are Mrs. Dora Gordon Steele, Mr. Herman Brandt, and Signor de Carlo. An orchestra, under Prof. Boettger, will also take part in the entertainment.

"Miss Multon" had its final representation at the Union Square Theatre last evening. To-morrow a translation of "Les Danichefs" will be brought out there, with a distribution of parts calling into requisition the services of Messrs. Thorne, O'Neill, Floyd, Parselle, and Montgomery and of Mmes. Rogers, Morant, Jewett, Vernon, Wilkins, and Farren.

As already announced, Miss Emma Abbott will give the first of three concerts at Chickering Hall, on Wednesday evening next. Miss Abbott is to have the co-operation of Signori Brignoli and Ferranti, of Mr. Case, a pianist, and a graduate of the Paris Conservatoire, and of Herr Seifert, a German violinist, Mr. Maretzek directing the orchestra.

TERRIBLE MASSACRE IN CALI.

A TOWN IN COLOMBIA TAKEN AND SACKED BY ARMED MEN—HUNDREDS OF UNOFFENDING PERSONS SLAUGHTERED—SHAMELESS OUTRAGES PERPETRATED—FOREIGN RESIDENTS BADLY TREATED.

A special correspondent of the Panama Star and Herald of Jan. 19 writes from Palmira, Jan. 3, as follows: "On the 18th of December it was reported that the Conservatives intended to rise in the cities of Cali, Palmira and other places. On the 20th they attacked the City of Cali, overpowered the small guard at the chartel, freed the political prisoners, and succeeded in organizing a force of about 300 men badly armed, and began to prepare for resistance. But before many days passed, the Liberals surrounded Cali with a force of about 2,000 to 3,000, and on the 24th attacked the Conservatives, who tried to defend themselves for a short time, and, of course, succumbed. The Liberals felt exasperated, believing the Conservatives had abused the confidence that was placed in them. Therefore, Gen. Peña, the leader of the Liberal forces at Cali, gave orders that no prisoners should be taken alive, and the town to be delivered over to the troops. The consequence of it was that every Conservative that was caught, with or without arms, was cut down. The houses were sacked, all furniture destroyed and all other kinds of outrages committed. The store-rooms and warehouses of merchandise disappeared. Foreigners shared the same fate as natives. In one word, the action of the Liberal troops can only be compared to the Bashi-Bazouks and scenes of Bulgaria were committed in America. Many Caucanos, who call themselves champions of equality, fraternity, and liberty! But I am very much afraid that the examples set by the Bashi-Bazouks and the Commune of Paris, and our Sitting Bull, have found in the troops under Peña not only fit and worthy disciples, but they have actually shown themselves their masters. For the present I shall cite only one instance. The furies of Peña got hold of Dr. Vicente Borrero, one of the first Presidents of the Conventions of Colombia for independence, aged 90 years, and blind, made him kneel, and then discharged their fire-arms at him.

DEPLORABLE SCENES REPORTED.

Another correspondent of the same paper, writing from Cali, Jan. 12, says: Gen. Peña rode in after his men. Like them he was the worse for drink, and now he deliberately ordered the town to be sacked, giving his banditti five hours license to slay, to rob, and to outrage the defenseless inhabitants at discretion. It is needless to say his orders were but too enthusiastically obeyed. By this time crowds of furies in the the shape of women of the low est class, in many cases with their hopeful offsprings at their heels, swarmed in the streets, hounding on the excited mob to break down all the doors that were not immediately thrown open. Long before the plaza was taken, the work of plunder had already begun in the side streets, and some of the stores in the plaza itself were broken into and stripped of their contents, before the firing had commenced. In Commercial street, out of 20 that existed before the attack, only four remain, and in other parts of the town two or three, by pure accident, escaped the general fate. A few merchants, favored by the exceptional position of their premises and by the assistance of friends among the invaders, succeeded in saving their goods, at the expense of all the liquors they had in their possession, but in the majority of cases the mere attempt has caused the loss of many valuable lives. By mid-day most of the stores were cleared of their contents. Men, women and children were seen staggering in every direction under the burden of their spoil and were in turn maltreated, knocked down, and sometimes even killed, and deprived in turn by their fellow-thieves of the proceeds of their robberies. Fortunately, perhaps, for the town, it happened that the plundered stores contained large quantities of liquors. Barrels and cases of wine and spirits were turned into the streets, and a saturnalia of drunkenness began that will never be forgotten by those who had the misfortune to witness the horrible scenes it originated. The destruction continued in all its fury. Everything that could not be removed or was not thought worth removing was destroyed, chopped, and hacked to pieces or burned. After the first rush on the stores had procured them an abundance of drink, bands of frenzied men patrolled the town, reeling, shouting, firing, and hacking at every living creature they met on their way, but still unsatiated with the slaughter in the streets, they poured into the houses of Liberals and Conservatives alike, mostly though of the latter, and continued the work of robbery, murder, and destruction. All the Conservatives they met were ruthlessly killed, and many Liberals who tried to arrest the barbarians in their progress, or to shield friends or relatives, and persons suspected of sympathizing with the Conservatives, or of having no decided opinion in politics shared the same fate. Neither age nor sex nor infirmity constituted the least safeguard. Most of the Conservatives, thinking—perhaps too rashly and selfishly—that the persons of men alone were in danger, had abandoned their homes, leaving in them only the women of their households. Others, when the risk grew imminent, had endeavored to hide themselves indoors, and were dragged out to be slain under the very eyes of the terrified women. On the other hand, the unfortunate wives and daughters of the Conservatives were pitilessly hunted from house to house, meeting with the most shameless outrages at the hands of their fiendish pursuers. But all the horrors are as nothing compared with the still more frightful excesses perpetrated in the suburbs and on the estates in the surrounding country. There murder, lust, robbery, and incendiarism have continued unchecked for days together. All the small shopkeepers have been deprived of house and home, all the estates ravaged, their cattle driven away or shot, the hedges torn down, the cane fields burned, even the machinery destroyed, so as to render it useless to its owners.

THE OFFICIAL REPORT.

Gen Peña, in his official report, briefly refers to the affair as follows: "I think it proper to make known to the Government through you, that the rebels had resolved to destroy the City of Cali by burning the magazine. With that object they set on fire that of the City Hall, which fortunately burned only in part, destroying a portion of the building. That of Santa Librada, which contained more than half a million cartridges and 40 quintals of powder, was on the point of being destroyed, the fire being over the mine, when our troops took the barracks. The criminal intention of reducing this heroic city to ashes, and the tenacious resistance of the enemy, incensed me to damage the fury of the conflict, and the punishment was severe."

THE ACT OFFICIALLY CONDEMNED.

The Government of the State thanks the Commander in Chief who directed the combat of the 24th of last month, which resulted in the recovery of this city, which had been taken possession of by a body of rebels, and acknowledges also the services of the other citizens who composed the victorious army. It likewise recognizes and appreciates, as is its duty, the activity and efficiency with which the municipal chiefs of Buga, Palmira, and Santander, exerted themselves to conquer this faction, and that of Buenaventura which, finding itself at liberty to lend its military services, ordered forces to Palmira.

But, if the Government congratulates itself on account of the victory, it deplores and condemns in the most solemn manner the excesses which followed. After their triumph, a part of the victorious troops committed offences against morality, which are entirely incompatible with the disposition, doctrine, and tendencies of the Liberal Party. The Government, in compliance with the imperative duty to protect its dignity and the honor of the party which it upholds, condemns severely the said excesses, and will employ itself, if the situation of the war which overruns the country will permit, in investigating who are the persons responsible for such excesses, in order that upon them exclusively may justly fall the judgment of public opinion and of history. Publish this resolution in the official Bulletin for the information of all.

THE PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

RESUMPTION OF SPECIE PAYMENTS.

PAPER MONEY AND GOLD COIN OF EQUAL VALUE—HOW SUCH A RESULT MAY BE ATTAINED—EXPORTS AND IMPORTS—VARIOUS RECOMMENDATIONS MADE—INSTANT RELIEF TO THE COUNTRY EXPECTED.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 3.—The following is the President's Message on the subject of the resumption of specie payments:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

By the act of Congress approved Jan. 14, 1875, "To provide for the resumption of specie payments," the 1st of January, 1879, is fixed as the date when such resumption is to begin. It may not be desirable to fix an earlier date when it shall actually become obligatory upon the Government to redeem its outstanding legal-tender notes in coin on presentation, but it is certainly most desirable, and will prove most beneficial to every pecuniary interest of the country, to hasten the day when the paper circulation of the country and the gold coin shall have equal values. At a later day, if currency and coin should retain equal values, it might become advisable to authorize or direct resumption. I believe the time will come when by a simple act of the Executive branch of the Government this most desirable result can be attained. I am strengthened in this view by the course trade has taken in the last two years, and by the strength of the credit of the United States at home and abroad. For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1876, the exports of the United States exceeded the imports by $120,213,102, but our exports include $40,569,621 of specie and bullion in excess of the imports of the same commodities. For the six months of the present fiscal year from July 1, 1876, to Jan. 1, 1877, the excess of exports over imports amounted to $107,544,869, and the imports of specie and bullion exceeded the exports of the precious metals by $6,192,147 in the same time. The actual excess of exports over imports for the six months, exclusive of specie and bullion, amounted to $113,737,040, showing for the time being the accumulation of specie and bullion in the country amounting to more than $6,000,000, in addition to the national product of these metals for the same period, a total increase of gold and silver for the six months not far short of $60,000,000. It is evident that, unless this great increase of the precious metals can be utilized at home in such a way as to make it in some manner remunerative to holders, it must seek a foreign market as surely as would any other product of the soil or manufactory. Any legislation which will keep coin and bullion at home will, in my judgment, soon bring about practical resumption, and will add the coin of the country to the circulating medium, thus securing a healthy "inflation" of a sound currency, to the great advantage of every legitimate business interest. The act providing for the resumption of specie payments authorized the Secretary of the Treasury to issue bonds of either of the descriptions named in the act of Congress approved July 4, 1870, entitled "An act to authorize the refunding of the national debt," for not less than par in gold. With the present value of the 4½ per cent. bonds in the markets of the world, they could be exchanged at par for gold, thus strengthening the Treasury to meet final resumption and to keep the excess of coin over the demand pending its permanent use a circulating medium at home. All that would further be required would be to reduce the volume of legal-tender notes in circulation. To accomplish this I would suggest an act authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to issue 4 per cent. bonds, with 40 years to run before maturity, to be exchanged for legal-tender notes whenever presented in sums not less than any multiple thereof, the whole amount of such bonds, however, not to exceed $150,000,000. To increase the home demand for such bonds I would recommend that they be available for deposit in the United States Treasury for banking purposes under the various provisions of the law relating to national banks. I would suggest further, that national banks be required to retain a certain per cent. of the coin interest received by them from the bonds deposited with the Treasury to secure their circulation. I would also recommend the repeal of the third section of the joint resolution for the issue of silver coin, approved July 22, 1876, limiting the subsidiary coin and fractional currency to $50,000,000.

I am satisfied that if Congress will enact some such law as will accomplish the end suggested, they will give a relief to the country, instant in its effect, and for which they will receive the gratitude of the whole people.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, Feb. 3, 1877.

ATTEMPT AT BLACK-MAIL.

Henry C. Clark was taken before Justice Wandell, at the Essex Market Police Court, yesterday, charged with attempting to black-mail Mr. Frederick A. Thompson, Secretary of the Children's Educational Relief Association. Clark told Mr. Thompson that he was a reporter on the staff of the World, and had been directed to investigate certain charges against the management of the society. He offered, however, to write a favorable article provided he was given $10. He was told to call again, and yesterday Mr. Thompson pretended to accede to his demand, and was in the act of counting out the desired sum when a detective, who was concealed in the room, arrested him. Owing to the youth of the prisoner, and the fact that the money had not actually been placed in his hands, Justice Wandell released him. Clark at one time was really employed as a reporter on the World, but was dismissed some two months ago.

NOVEL ATHLETIC ENTERTAINMENT.

A novel athletic entertainment will shortly be given by a well-known amateur of this City. Among other feats that he proposes to perform are juggling with dumb-bells and ring-weights, none of them to weigh less than 40 pounds, and ranging as high as 180 pounds, and lifting enormous weights. He will raise and hold in his hands a cannon weighing 1,000 pounds while it is being loaded and fired. He will also lift a horse 15 hands high six inches from the ground by main strength, standing over the animal on a platform. He will then lift a team of horses in the same manner, and will next lift a platform containing a dozen persons. While suspended in mid-air by one hand he will put up to arm's length over his head a 100-pound dumb-bell with the other.

LATEST STYLES AND COMBINATIONS.

COSTUMES OF THE PERIOD ALL ORNAMENT —THE REIGN OF SULPHUR-COLOR— WALKING DRESSES AND BALL DRESSES— FANCY TOILETS FOR MASKERS.

If fancy articles and combination of colors were taken from the present fashions little of them would remain. No system is adhered to, and the oddest notions are adopted. Reality and imitation, the beautiful and the ugly, meet with equal favor. What was popular yesterday will be thrown aside to-morrow. To be in the height of fashion the fancy styles must be liberally patronized and constant changes be made. This is no easy matter, and only to describe the many varied combinations of color and material is quite a task. Visiting and evening suits are at this season the most necessary. Reception dresses are always accompanied by outer garments of some kind. If the suit is of satin or velvet a "visite" of sicilienne, lined with white plush and trimmed with passementerie and chenille fringe, may be worn. Seal-skin cloaks may be worn over faille suits. For a more simple toilet, such as cloth combined with velvet, a paletot cuirass may be made of the same materials, or a sicilienne paletot Russe. The latest style for this garment is to trim it around the neck and down the front with broad bands of silver beaver. The lower borders are left untrimmed. The sleeves and pockets have the same trimming.

The bulgare plait is out of fashion. For full dress, plain or frappé velvet, satin, brocart, and embroidered crêpe de chine are suitable. Foulard, surah matelassé, cachemire, broché, faille, and gaze de soie, all light up to good advantage. The proper combination of materials is the great secret of the toilet. Mention has already been made of the advantage which can be derived from the princess out dress, by making, for instance, the four small side pieces of velvet, and the fronts, back, and part of the sleeves, of silk or broché goods; then trim the borders and seams with lace, and enrich the toilet with bows. For this model, black trimmings are made of lace embroidered with chenille or gold, and a variety of rich fringes and embroideries. Ribbon of plush on one side and satin on the other serves for many purposes; it is made in all shades. In addition to the many elegant laces always used for evening wear, handsome crêpe lisse parures, garlands and leaves, real or imitation diamonds, and fancy jewelry are used in great profusion. Light tissues, such as tulle and gauze, continue in use for the sleeves of dresses made of heavy materials. Some are puffed, and have insertion, and narrow ribbon velvet is placed around. The same dress can by this means be arranged in two different ways, by making the sleeves and breast piece sometimes of black lace and tulle, and sometimes of white lace and tulle, and using different velvet and flowers. An evening toilet somewhat in this style is a sulphur-colored faille princess dress. It is very tight-fitting, has a very long train, and is trimmed with a plaiting bordered with valenciennes. The tunique is of dotted white tulle, trimmed with white Spanish lace; it is shirred on the sides, forming a square apron, and in the back is a long train slightly draped. On the side is a shell-shaped lace trimming fastened by sulphur-colored silk cordings, with tassels falling below. The waist is cut square in the neck. The sleeves are of dotted lace, puffed and combined with insertion, with sulphur-colored ribbon underneath. A white Spanish lace "habit" forms the cuirass in front, fitting tightly to the dress. The borders are trimmed with white Spanish lace, with golden beads worked upon the heading. Sulphur-colored cordelières with bows are so placed as to form the lower trimming of the lace waist. The necklace consists of golden beads. The hair is also dressed with these beads. This suit can be simplified by substituting black lace for the white, and dispensing with the golden beads.

Many rich toilets are ornamented with beads, and golden and silk cordelières. In embroideries, the very rich chenille and the broderie mousse worked upon very light tulle are the favorites. Scarfs are draped with flowers in many fanciful ways.

Sulphur color now replaces all the different shades of yellow lately in vogue. Ivory-white and caroubier form a beautiful combination. Two new Parisian styles suitable for young ladies are the "jenne martyre" and the "robe Virginie." The first-named may be of white gauze, trimmed with gauze drapings fastened here and there with flowers. The second dress may be of very light blue or pink faille, with mousseline de l'Inde scarfs embroidered with white silk. The robe Grecque is another new style; it can be made of grenadine over white faille. These dresses are most elegant when made of grenadine, stamped with bands of velours frappé and leaves. Grenadine and mousseline de soie are trimmed with galloon, a white silk-fulled trimming and jet beads, which are again coming into fashion.

The most elegant dresses for middle-aged ladies are of brocart and velvet made with habits Louis XV. and XVI. The habit Louis XVI. is pretty, with a long vest, richly worked with chenille. The habit is sometimes trimmed with bands of velvet, drap de soie, or cloth, in which case the skirts are trimmed to match.

A handsome white ball dress may combine faille and mousseline de soie. The front of the faille skirt is trimmed with a deep puffing and flounce. The train has a narrow flounce surrounded by four puffings; between each puffing is a caroubier chenille cording. The princess apron is trimmed with two lace flowers surmounted by a full garland of variegated flowers, joined in the back under a caroubier ribbon. The waist is cut with a square low neck, and buttons over from right to left. The side which buttons over is trimmed with "point de Bruxelles" or "d'Angleterre," with various colored roses or leaves. This trimming extends all the way down the side of the apron.

A very elegant bridal dress has the brocart front cut in princess shape, and the small front side-pieces of white satin. The side-pieces in the back are of brocart. The princess cut back, which forms a long train, is of satin. The front of the skirt is trimmed with a crêpe lisse plaited flounce. The heading of the flounce consists of a garland of orange blossoms. On the side of the flounce are large white satin bows. The upper part of the waist is covered with a crêpe lisse "guimpe modestie" arranged in small plaits and buttoning up the back; it is trimmed around with a plaiting. On one side is a bunch of orange blossoms. A ruching is around the neck. The upper part of the sleeve is of brocart, and the lower part of satin. Between the two materials is a crêpe lisse band tied on the outside in a bow, with a bunch of orange blossoms in the centre. The lower part of the sleeves have a deep plaited crêpe lisse puff with a ruching at the wrist. The aumonière is of orange blossoms, combined with satin loops, and depends from a white silk cordelière. The hair is dressed with a wreath of orange blossoms. The "voile à la Juive" is of tulle de Bruxelles. This model can be made very simple by having it altogether of faille, sicilienne, or even alpaca. A very simple bridal-dress can also be made of white foulard. The front of the skirt is cut out in large points falling over a plaited flounce. The train is perfectly plain. The apron is surrounded by a number of fine pipings and a plaiting. It is slightly draped and tied in the back. The cuirass is trimmed with a narrow piping, and laces up the back. A crêpe lisse fichu, trimmed with Bruges lace, is worn over the waist; it is fastened in front under a bouquet of orange blossoms. The lower part of the sleeves is trimmed with crêpe lisse plaitings and the same kind of lace. The neck trimming and ruching around the arm are of crêpe lisse. A long spray of orange blossoms falls down the back of the head. The veil is of tulle.

A visiting dress can be made of brown and ash blonde velvet and façonné, or faille and façonné. The brown skirt is trimmed with a flounce put on in hollow plaits, and surmounted by a ruching in the lighter shade. Taken diagonally across the front of the skirt are two façonné plaited scarfs in the light shade, finished with a deep fringe. The façonné cuirass is very tight-fitting, and trimmed all around and up the back with cashemire galloon worked in colors. This cuirass buttons up the back; the left side, which buttons over, terminates in a point and falls lower than the right side. The revers extend in points over the back. They are trimmed with the same cashemire galloon. The brown velvet sleeves have a band of galloon up the outside seams. The deep cuffs are in the lighter shade; they are pointed on the outside and ornamented with four buttons. The façonné train which falls over the brown skirt is trimmed with galloon. On either side is a trimming made in imitation of a second train, consisting of ash blonde plaiting arranged up the sides in groups of fine plaits with plain pieces alternating. Below the cuirass, between the façonné train and the plaitings, is a trimming consisting of bands, brown velvet galloon, and light-colored plaitings. The bonnet corresponding with the suit is of gray felt. Around the crown is a piece of brown plush plaited, falling on the back in a short loop. Upon the top of the crown is a bunch of gray feathers. Under the brim is a white ruching. Another handsome, though rather showy, walking suit is made of fancy brocé woolen goods. The long skirt is trimmed with a rather deep flounce, bordered with a deep band of checked black and white galloon, with a narrow heading of red. The polonaise is trimmed with the same deep galloon, and headed with red, and a deep galloon plaiting fringe. The middle of the back is plaited in flat plaits up to the back of the neck, where it falls loose in fan shape. These plaits allow of the polonaise falling very full in the back, where it is raised in puffs. The apron is taken each side under the puffs. On the side, in the back, a piece of galloon, headed with red, forms revers, which fall over the puffs. Upon one of the revers is a red bow. The square pocket is bound with red, and trimmed with black and white fringe. The cuffs are made of black and white checked galloon, headed with red. The bonnet, matching the suit, has a soft black velvet crown and a plaited brim. A black feather starts from the centre in front and falls over the crown. In front, over the feather, is a bluish steel ornament. In the back are red flowers. The velvet strings are tied on one side.

As it is now the season for fancy dress balls, a description of some Parisian costumes may prove useful. There is the Girofié-Girofla dress, made of white satin, embroidered with gold and trimmed with fringe. A fine golden belt is around the waist encircled with appliqués of stones and pearls: it extends around the front diagonally. Below is another diagonal band which drapes the overdress; over this is an ornament. The overskirt is trimmed with a deep golden fringe. The waist is cut very low in the neck and trimmed over the shoulders with a golden band in bretelle shape. The white crêpe lisse veil is very long and dotted with gold. The coiffure consists of a heavy golden band ornamented with pearls and imitation jewels. This band is placed back upon the head, with strings of pearls falling in scallops over the front hair. In the back are three white ostrich feathers. On the upper part of the arm is a deep flat golden bracelet; on the wrist is a smaller one. The necklace consists of three or four rows of golden beads. The ear-rings are very long, and correspond with the necklace and belt. The white marabout fan has a golden handle. The shoes are of white satin. Another fancy dress is the "costume de Persane." The short underskirt is of red satin. The broad blue satin Turkish trousers are fastened above the shoes. The pardessus is of blue goods figured with gold. It is trimmed around with four rows of golden lace. Up the front is the same trimming. The neck is cut open in a point. The large flowing sleeves are lined with yellow, and trimmed around the outside with fur. On the inside of the sleeve is a golden ornament with colored stones. Under the square opening in front is a tight-fitting red waist, and under the flowing sleeves are tight red satin sleeves. The deep belt is also of gold enriched with colored stones. The coiffure consists of a high-pointed black velvet hat, with a bordering of colored stones. On the side is an aigrette, fastened down under an ornament of imitation jewels. From the top of the hat, in the back, hangs a small crêpe lisse white veil, bordered with gold. The necklace and ear-rings are of colored stones and pearls. The Asiatic slippers are of cloth covered with gold.

The "favorite slave" costume has a red satin waist with a deep bordering of gold and stones. The Madagascar scarf is striped in several colors and trimmed with a deep golden fringe, mingling with several colored silks. This scarf is taken tight around the body and tied in front, where it is left to hang in a straight piece. This piece is ornamented on the lower border with a fringe, and on the top with a large round ornament. Over the gauze skirt are golden figures. The green satin Turkish trousers fasten below the knee. The necklace and ear-rings consist of golden beads. The coiffure comprises a band of gold enriched with colored stones taken around the front of the head, and smaller bands taken through the puffs on the top of the head. Three strings of beads are taken from either side of the coiffure and hang loosely around the face. In the back the hair is crimped and hangs loose. The slippers are red satin; the stockings are of flesh-colored silk.

Flowers are not as much used by modistes as they have been. When used they are mostly concealed under lace and mingled with loops. Feathers are accounted much more elegant. All colored feathers are worn arranged in bands. Cocks' feathers are also very popular. All kinds of fancy feathers are employed, and are quite as generally used as very expensive ones. White cocks' feathers dotted with mother of pearl are very beautiful when tastefully placed upon a white bonnet. Chenille fringes and tassels are still used. Velvet and satin Autumn leaves, and steel and other ornaments are among the bonnet trimmings. A pretty bonnet is of slate colored felt, trimmed on the lower part of the crown with a ribbon bow in the same color. The ribbon strings are taken from the bow and form the mentonnières. Upon the crown is a garland of bronzed satin dead leaves. Underneath is a band of velvet and a tuft of red pinks on one side. Another bonnet is Directoire shape, made of "taliení" plush. On the side is a large fan-shaped plush bow, placed rather high. Draperies of the same are crossed in the back, forming the strings, which are tied on the side near the ear.

All sorts of fans are in favor this Winter, black feather fans with paintings, colored feather fans, lace fans, and many other kinds. Very large fans are again used for the theatre and opera.

THE EMPRESS AND HER STARVING SUBJECTS.

From the London Times.

In one of the sweetest of operas the hearer is charmed with a chorus whose graceful and rhythmic movement reflects the gentle and indolent swaying of Summer seas; but in the midst of the dreamy softness of Weber's music obtrude the recurrent notes which warn us to remember the sleepless watchfulness of the powers of the storm. It is not given to us to forget the harsh dissonance of pain. Yesterday we were all reading of the pomp and ceremony of Oriental magnificence, and for a brief hour the mind escaped from the dismal realities of our wintry skies to live amid the splendors of Delhi. The Viceroy seemed to have made the tales of Arabian fiction true, and to have justified the largest phrases of our poets in describing the riches of the gorgeous East. Upon the Kings who came to testify their allegiance before the representative of England's Queen barbaric pearl and gold were showered more profusely than Milton had ever imagined, and though it must have been difficult to banish the recollections of warfare in the sight of the Ridge of Delhi, the suggestion of privation was for a time forgotten. To-day the irrepressible contrast is reasserted. Instead of the reckless profusion of inexhaustible wealth, we have to face the grim fact of imminent famine. Last week the capital of the Moguls witnessed a magnificent display of luxury and pride. Princes and Governors came together from every province, and vied with one another in the extravagance of their pomp. Nothing was too rich, nothing too costly, to become the ceremonial they shared. Whatever was most distinguished for the glory of its design or for the delicacy or extent of the labor spent upon its execution was brought and laid at the feet of the Viceroy as appropriate offerings to the majesty he represented. Who would have supposed that, in this highest hour of imperial pride, the mind of the central figure of the pageant was disturbed by thoughts, that would come to mar his satisfaction, of thousands and hundreds of thousands—nay, of a million of persons besieging the officials and subofficials of the Indian Government to give them a little work, that they might have a handful of rice lest they die?

MARRIAGE IN MISSOURI.

The St. Louis Republican thus expresses itself: "We are unable to see any particular benefit in the proposed bill establishing a system of marriage licenses. Such a change can never be made of any consequence as a branch of revenue, but becomes an annoying exaction, exercising a repressive influence on youthful affection and the population of the State. The Legislatures of Missouri have killed such a bill more than once before, and we rather expect the same thing will happen now. The present law in force is liberal in its provisions, and probably as effective as any that can be prepared. It prohibits, under penalty, the marriage of minors, and requires all marriages to be properly recorded, and we see very little use in trying to go any further. When persons of the proper age desire to get married the State has no interest in embarrassing their actions. 'Let them marry,' as St. Paul says, but let it be done 'decently and in order.' As to hunting round for licenses, and witnesses, and magistrates, as is still done in England and Continental Europe, no practical benefits result. In addition to ministers of the gospel, authorize the proper public officers to perform marriages with all proper caution for the legal status of the parties, and a public record of the facts, and there let the matter rest. If the aim of Western legislation is to abolish unnecessary forms and to simplify the operation of the law on all matters connected with social development and growth, there is little use in the law in question."

A KANGAROO MOUSE.

The New-Haven Journal of Saturday contains the following: "A few days ago, a pet canary bird owned in a family in East Haven was found early one morning dead in its cage. A good many feathers were found scattered in the bottom of the cage, and the body of the bird had suffered considerable laceration, as from the teeth of an animal. It was impossible that the mischief had been done by a cat, and the following night a mouse-trap was set inside the cage. No catch, however, until the night succeeding, when there got into the trap a kangaroo mouse, as somebody named it. This little animal, which had undoubtedly destroyed the canary, is about the size of an ordinary mouse, perhaps not quite as large. Its front legs are much shorter than the others, and it has a way of sitting up like a kangaroo. Its movement is a jump or spring, like that of a kangaroo, and it has a spot of white fur on its breast. It is conjectured that the little animal may have been brought to this country in some foreign vessel, but the question how it reached East Haven shore and entered a dwelling-house renders such a supposition hardly reasonable."

A DRUNKEN MAN'S ESCAPE.

The Albany Express of Saturday says: "Hugh Geoghegan, described as a laborer, 29 years of age, had a most wonderful escape from serious injury and perhaps death, while intoxicated on North Broadway on Thursday evening. He was staggering along in the centre of the street, and as a horse car came along fell in front of it, with his legs directly across the track. The wheels passed over both limbs, being thrown off the track in consequence. Strange to say, Geoghegan, on being picked up and conveyed into the Third Precinct Station-house, was found to have sustained no fracture and no material injury to either limb, the only mark discernible was a slight indentation and bruise of the flesh caused by the flange of the wheel. In falling his head struck the ice and was considerable bruised. He was mulcted in a fine for being drunk, and then allowed by Justice Clute to go home and get his injuries attended to."

MERRIMAC SHIPBUILDERS.

An historical sketch of the shipbuilders on the banks of the Merrimac River shows that among the most prominent are John Currier, Jr., who, since 1831, has built 94 vessels, including two now on the stocks, which foot up 85,315 tons; Messrs. Charles H. Currier & Co. and George E. Currier, who have built 28 sail of 13,702 tons; Messrs. Atkinson & Filmore, who have built 11, of 9,990 tons, and Hon. George W. Jackman, Jr., who has built 27, of 26,570 tons. Mr. Donald McKay, now of East Boston, laid the foundation of his fame as a shipbuilder on the banks of the Merrimac. It was there that he built for the late Enoch Train & Co. the beautiful ship Joshua Bates, for their line of Boston and Liverpool packets, which was one of the most successful vessels afloat. At the suggestion of Mr. Train, Mr. McKay removed to East Boston. Mr. John Currier, Jr., has adhered to the Merrimac, and has given it much of its high reputation for the excellence of its shipping. Hon. George W. Jackman's vessels have been remarkably lucky, for they were all well built of good materials.

THE HOUSEHOLD COLUMN.

STATUS OF THE FEBRUARY MARKETS

The markets are well supplied with everything eatable. Prime cuts of beef, lamb, and veal are sold at prices the same as last week, and butchers will not concede anything, even to their best customers. Pork can be bought cheaply, and poultry is sold at very low figures. Venison is now out of season, the Game laws forbidding its sale after Feb. 1. Other varieties of game are plentiful, and quail, grouse, partridges, and wild ducks can be bought at low rates. Butter, eggs, and cheese are selling at the prices of last week, but there is a tendency to a decline in the rates for the first two articles. Choice apples are in light supply, and good Baldwins, Spitzenburgs, and Greenings are dear. Cranberries, grapes, and oranges are reasonably low, and are in good supply. Vegetables of all kinds are abundant, and buyers who will take the trouble can make good bargains. Among the new things in market are potatoes and tomatoes from the Bermuda Islands, and kale and spinach from the Southern States.

RECEIPTS FOR THE TABLE.

VEAL COLLOPS.—Cut part of a leg of veal into pieces three or four inches broad, sprinkle flour on them, fry in butter until brown, and then turn in water enough to cover the veal. When it boils take off the scum, put in two or three onions, a blade of mace, a little salt and pepper, and stew until tender; then take up the veal, thicken the gravy with flour and water mixed smoothly together, squeeze in the juice of a lemon—or a very good substitute is a teaspoonful of catsup—and turn the mixture over the browned collops. Garnish with thin slices of lemon.—SIBYL.

MOCK DUCK.—Prepare a good dressing, such as you would for a turkey or duck; take a round steak, pound it a little, spread the dressing over it, sprinkle with salt, pepper, and a few bits of butter, lap over the ends, roll the steak up tightly and tie closely; next spread two tablespoonfuls of butter over it, and brush it over with a well-beaten egg; put water in the baking-pan, lay the meat in on sticks put across the pan; baste often; bake for half an hour in a brisk oven; make a brown gravy and send to the table hot.

MACCARONI AND BEEF.—Fry in a hot pan with small quantity of hot fat till each side is brown, two pounds of round of beef, turn these after into a pot with enough boiling water to cover it, and cook slowly till done; half an hour before dishing throw in the pot one-quarter pound of maccaroni, and cook till done; salt to taste before adding the maccaroni; serve the beef in centre of dish and maccaroni around it; serve hot, and with grated cheese; should the water boil off add a little; boil the beef slowly and keep covered tightly, that there then evaporating more slowly.—HOUSEKEEPER.

BAKED MACCARONI.—Put into salted boiling water one-quarter pound Italian Maccaroni broken in pieces; let the water cover it; boil till quite tender, drain off the water and place the maccaroni neatly in a baking-dish; pour one-half cupful of milk over it and put butter size of an egg cut in small pieces on the top, and cover thickly with grated rich cheese. Place in the oven and bake till the milk is absorbed and the top is brown.—HOUSEKEEPER.

STEWED MACCARONI.—Cook quarter pound or more of maccaroni in water, or in strong beef stock, till tender, then drain nearly dry. If cooked in water, add two teaspoonfuls condensed-milk, butter size of an egg, stir grated cheese through it, and put some over it, and serve hot. If cooked in beef-stock, add the cheese only, or send the cheese around at the table.—HOUSEKEEPER.

TRIPE.—Cut the prepared tripe into small dice and put in a sauce-pan with some previously boiled onion, adding salt, pepper, and a few cloves; cover evenly with milk and let simmer 20 minutes. Just before serving, stir into it some butter and flour rubbed to a cream. Also, you can stew tripe and oysters together, seasoning with salt, cayenne pepper, and a blade of mace, and thickened as before. Tripe cut in squares, dipped in beaten egg and bread crumbs and fried brown. Curry powder is a decided addition to stewed tripe.—AUNT ADDIE.

EAST INDIA CURRY.—Two large onions fried lightly in butter, then four dessert spoons of curry powder and a small cupful of water; shake the pan to mix the whole well in and simmer veal or poultry, cut in small pieces. Fry this half an hour, then add another cupful of water, allowing it to simmer gently; salt to the taste. Serve with a wall of well-boiled rice around the dish.—RIDGEWOOD.

GENUINE EAST INDIA CURRY POWDER.—Best turmeric one pound; coriander seed, three-quarters of a pound; ginger, three ounces; black pepper, two ounces; caraway seeds, one-quarter of an ounce; cardamom seeds half an ounce, and 60 cloves, finely ground and well mixed.—RIDGEWOOD.

SHEEPS' TONGUES.—Put six tongues in one quart of warm water, with one moderate-sized carrot, two onions, one bay leaf, one piece of thyme, and one teaspoonful salt; simmer until they are tender, then skim them and trim off the roots and fat, and cut in two lengthwise; melt a piece of butter, adding the juice of a lemon; pour boiling over the tongues. A very inexpensive dish.—AUNT ADDIE.

TO COOK BRAINS, I.—One pair calves' brains; boil in water to cover a half-hour; roll two soda crackers fine, put in the same pan, and mash all together; add one tablespoonful butter, two spoonfuls vinegar, salt, and pepper; serve hot.—MRS. G. J.

TO COOK BRAINS, II.—Stew in a quarter of a pound of butter, a tablespoonful of chopped parsley, the juice of two lemons, a pinch of salt and white pepper.—AUNT ADDIE.

TO COOK POTATOES PROPERLY.—To boil white potatoes so that they are dry and mealy: Put them in a pot with barely sufficient water to cover them; add salt; as soon as the skins begin to crack lift the pot from the fire and drain off every drop of water; then lay a cloth over the pot, so that the steam will escape; set the pot close to the fire until they are thoroughly dry.—MURREY.

BOILED POTATOES.—Choose those of equal size; put them down in barely sufficient cold water to cover them; after they have boiled 10 or 15 minutes take out half the water, replacing it with cold; throw in two or three tablespoonfuls of salt, and when done carefully drain off all the water, remove the lid from the pot, and stand on the back of the range to get dry and keep hot.—RIDGEWOOD.

OYSTER AND CLAM FRITTERS.—Two cupfuls flour, two of milk, two eggs, and a little salt; beat well, and add an oyster to each spoonful of batter, as you drop it in the fat, which must be quite hot; clams should be chopped and stirred in the batter, then dropped by spoonfuls in the hot fat.

FRYING.—Croquettes, all kinds of fried potatoes, clams, oysters, &c., that are spoken of as fried, should be called boiled. There should be a sufficient quantity or fat in the pan to entirely cover the contents, and be so boiling hot as to cook immediately without burning. The hotter the fat the less it is absorbed in the cooking process. For all kinds of stews and pie mixtures the meat should be first fried in a small quantity of very hot fat, on each side, (particularly if in small pieces,) to a rich brown color, thereby keeping the fibres of meat closed, and preventing the escape of the juice, that otherwise escape in the gravy. After the frying the meat must then be boiled slowly, in just enough water to cover, till tender. In this instance but a small quantity of fat is used, as it is desired to merely crust the meat, and not entirely cook it. For soups, beef tea, &c., the meat is put first in cold water, so as to immediately draw out the juice of meat, which should not be salted till partly cooked, as salt toughens meat when first boiling.—HOUSEKEEPER.

ORANGE MARMALADE, I.—Allow a pound of sugar to a pound of fruit. Pare nair the oranges, and after scraping off as much of the white inner rind as possible, cut the yellow part in the shred with a pair of scissors; boil this in three waters, until tender and transparent, and set aside; grate the rind of the remaining oranges, take off and throw away all the thick white inner skin, quarter all the oranges, and take out the seeds; chop them very fine, drain all the juice that will come (without squeezing them) over the sugar, and make the syrup with this, adding very little water if the oranges are not very juicy; boil and skim the syrup five or six minutes; put in the boiled shreds and cook them 10 minutes; then the chopped fruit and grated peel and boil 30 minutes longer. Means oranges that come in March, are the best for the purpose; five dozen oranges make about 12 pounds of marmalade.—F. M. B.

ORANGE MARMALADE, II.—Boil your oranges until tender enough to pass a broom splint through them; carefully take out the pulp, free from seeds and skins, and then chop the peels very fine; to every pound of pulp and peel, allow a pound and a half of powdered white sugar; boil the seeds and inner skins in a small quantity of water for some time; strain to the sugar and boil up once; then add the pulp and peels, and let all boil together 20 minutes, or longer, until they become clear and thick marmalade. Stir them frequently while cooking, to prevent burning. The oranges must first be boiled in clear water, and it is best to change it once or twice while boiling, as it becomes very bitter, and there should be sufficient water in the preserving-kettle to cover them well. The bitter Seville orange makes the finest marmalade, with the addition of a few sweet oranges and one or two lemons to the dozen oranges. When the marmalade is done, put in small jelly glasses, wet with cold water. One dozen oranges made into marmalade will fill from six to eight glasses.—E. B.

SCOTCH MARMALADE.—Cut Seville oranges in quarters, pull off the rinds, and place in cold water sufficient to cover; remove the pulp and juice from the skin and pips, cover from the air until the rinds have remained in water 24 hours; strain the rinds and boil until tender in fresh cold water; drain and cut in three strips; add the pulp and juice, and to each pound of fruit allow a pound and a half of cut sugar; boil three-quarters of an hour, stir constantly.

ORANGE FRITTERS.—One pound flour, one pint of milk, with a teaspoonful of salt in it, and a quarter pound of melted butter, and three eggs beaten very light. Prepare four oranges by removing the yellow rind and every particle of white pith, divide into small pieces without breaking the skin. In each spoonful of batter put a piece of orange, and fry a golden brown; sift powdered sugar over as soon as taken from the pan.—AUNT ADDIE.

ORANGE CAKE.—Two cupfuls sugar, two cupfuls flour; one-half cupful water, the yolks of four eggs, and whites of three, the juice and grated rind of one orange, one teaspoonful cream-tartar; one-half teaspoonful soda; bake in four thin cakes as for jelly cake; make an icing of the remaining white of an egg, the juice and rind of another orange and pulverized sugar; spread between the layers as in jelly cake.

LEMON AND ORANGE EXTRACTS.—Save your peels and dry them thoroughly until they are as hard as stones; then grate them on a fine grater, and put in a glass jar or bottle. The odor and flavor are delicious.

ORANGE JELLY.—To every pound of sugar and ounce of isinglass put one pint of orange-juice and the juice of one lemon, and the yellow rind of two oranges and the yellow rind or one-half lemon. Put in a porcelain pan over the fire and stir until it boils; skim well. The isinglass must be dissolved first in a little water. A few grains of saffron or a few drops of prepared cochineal will improve the color, and the beaten white of egg will clarify. Strain through jelly bag.—AUNT ADDIE.

BREAKFAST—POACHED EGGS.—Place a frying-pan of salted boiling water on the fire, filled with as many small muffin-rings as it will hold; break the eggs slightly in a cup, and pour into the rings; boil them two and a half or three minutes; remove the rings, and take up the eggs singly in a strainer; serve on half slices of nicely browned and buttered toast of baker's bread; put a small piece of butter on each egg; pepper slightly, and garnish with sprigs of parsley. Serve hot.—HOUSEKEEPER.

TO COOK RICE.—Wash in cold water several times, removing innerfect grains. To one pint of rice put three quarts of boiling water, let it boil seventeen minutes from the time it fairly begins. Turn off the water, remove the pot lid, and put on the back of range, thus securing the grains being white, seperate, and dry. For griddle cakes rice, should be mashed, boiled in cold milk in similar, proportions, sweetened and flavored, and turned into wet molds to turn out when cold.—RIDGEWOOD.

CORN-BREAD.—Three teacupfuls yellow cornmeal, one teacupful wheat flour, one-half cupful sugar, one teaspoonful salt, two teaspoonfuls baking-powder; mix together dry, wet with tepid water to a thick batter; bake in sheet or patty pans in quick oven.—L. G. J.

COFFEE WITHOUT USING FILTERS.—Have the coffee ground rather coarse, and mix it thoroughly with the white of an egg. Pour the water on when boiling hard and let simmer 15 minutes; pour off from the grounds at once and send to table.—AUNT ADDIE.

MUFFINS.—To one quart of milk add two eggs well beaten, a lump of butter half the size of an egg and flour enough to make a stiff batter; stir in half a pint of yeast; let stand till perfectly light, and bake on a griddle in tin rings made for the purpose.—MARY.

SPONGE PUDDING.—One-fourth pound each of flour, butter, and sugar, one quart of milk, 12 eggs; mix butter, flour, and sugar together, add to the milk, and boil until it thickens; when cool add first the yolks of the eggs, then the whites, beaten to a stiff froth. Place the pudding dish in a pan partly filled with water and bake in the oven and hour an hour. For the sauce, three-fourths cupful butter, two cupfuls sugar, and one of wine. Mix butter and sugar to a cream, add the wine, a spoonful at a time, and put the dish in a pan of hot water to dissolve. This makes a light delicious pudding.—AUNT CADDIE.

CHEAP RASPBERRY JELLY.—Boil one-fourth pound of dried raspberries in a pint of water for about 10 minutes, then strain; bring the juice to a boil, sweeten to taste, and stir into it about two tablespoonfuls of corn-starch; after taking it off the fire stir a minute or two; when cold it is ready for use.

RICE MERINGUE.—One cupful rice; boil in one pint water; add one pint milk, yolks of three eggs, juice and grated rind of one lemon; sugar to taste; after baking beat whites of the eggs to stiff froth; add one cupful sugar, spread over the pudding and brown in the oven.—M. S. E.

FRENCH CANNED MUSHROOMS.—Melt a good-sized lump of butter in a frying-pan, strain the liquor off the mushrooms, and fry in the butter 10 or 15 minutes, until quite brown; stir constantly to prevent burning; then add water, and the liquor from mushrooms sufficient to cover them; season with salt and pepper; cover tightly, and stew slowly an hour or more until quite tender; thicken the gravy with flour, and you will have a delicious dish.—H. A. B.

USEFUL FAMILY HINTS.

SKELETON LEAVES.—Make a solution of caustic soda by dissolving three ounces of washing soda in 40 ounces (2 pints) of boiling water, adding one and a half ounces of lime, previously slacked; boil for minutes; decant this to clear solution and bring it to a boil; during the ebullition boil the leaves in it briskly for one hour, adding boiling water occasionally to supply the deficiency caused by evaporation. Take out a leaf and rub it between the fingers under the water; if the epidermis and parenchyma separate easily the rest of the leaves may be similarly treated; if not, continue the boiling some time longer. To bleach the skeleton, mix a dram of chlorids of lime with one pint of water, adding sufficient acetic acid to fiberate the chloride; steep in this until white, about 10 minutes; do not let them stay in this too long, or they will become brittle. Put them in clear water and float them on sheets of paper, remove them from paper before they are quite dry and place them in a book or in a botanical press.—RIDGEWOOD.

TO COLOR BLACK.—Four ounces copperas, and one ounce logwood extract to each pound of goods; dissolve the copperas in water sufficient to cover the goods; work them in clean water before putting them in the copperas water, to prevent spotting; boil them in the copperas water about 20 minutes; take them out, rinse in clear water first, then wash in soap-suds till it seems as soft as before it was put in the copperas-water; then put it in the logwood dye, and let it boil about 20 minutes; take out, and let stand a day; wash before it dries, or after, as is most convenient; it will neither crock, fade, nor grow rusty.—OLD HOUSEKEEPER.

PASTE FOR SCRAP-BOOK, I.—Mix good clean flour with cold water into a thick paste well blended together, then add boiling water, stirring well up until it is of a consistency that can be easily and smoothly spread with a brush; add to this a spoonful or two of brown sugar, a little corrosive sublimate, and about half a dozen drops of oil of lavender.—E. N.

TEGITMEIERS' "HAND-BOOK."—This little volume is published by MacMillan & Co., London, and can be obtained at their branch house in this City.

PASTE FOR SCRAP-BOOK II.—Plain boiled starch is a very nice paste; also gum tragacanth dissolved in warm water.—AUNT ADDIE.

TO RESTORE FADED STRAW.—Burn a small quantity of sulphur in a shading dish, (a tin plate on the range will do as well,) and hold the article in the resulting fumes.—CHEMIST.

TO KEEP MILK FROM TURNING.—Wet the dish with cold water before using.—MURREY.

A RELIEF FOR CHILBLAINS.—A lemon cut in half and rubbed on the feet will relieve chilblains and the tenderness following.—ISABELLA.

RELIEF FOR RHEUMATISM.—Four drops of fluid extract veratum, taken once in three or four hours. There is nothing dangerous about it; it is its own antidote; it any one gets a little too much they will throw it up.

MILITARY GOSSIP.

Lieut. Col. Meyenborg, commanding the Fifteenth Battalion, Brooklyn, has appointed Mr. David Lynch to the position of Quartermaster on his staff.

Company I, "Buffalo Guards," Second Regiment, Pennsylvania National Guard, gave a grand "decoration" ball at Philadelphia last Thursday night. A deputation from the Seventy-first Regiment of this City participated in the festivities.

Battery B, Artillery, Major John Keim, commanding, held a working drill at its armory in Elm street last Wednesday evening. A number of evolutions were executed, and Major Keim carefully instructed his men in many details in which the men were rusty from want of practice.

The Eighth Regiment, Col. George D. Scott, commanding, is under orders to assemble in fatigue uniform at the State Arsenal on Tuesday, Feb. 6, and Friday, Feb. 16, for instruction in the "School of the Battalion." Roll will be called at 7:45 P. M. The regular monthly meeting of the Board of Officers of this command will take place on Monday, Feb. 12, at 8 P. M.

The project of organizing a Gatling battery, to be attached to the First Division, is meeting with much favor from aspirants for military honors. Capt. Wetmore has received applications for membership from nineteen gentlemen during the past week, and thinks he will have no difficulty in obtaining all the men required for the purpose from the best classes of young men in this City.

Brig. Gen. Varian, commanding the Third Brigade, has appointed a court-martial for the trial of delinquents in his command below the rank of Major, to convene at the armory of the Eighth Regiment, No. 226 West Twenty-third street, on Monday, Feb. 12, at 8 P. M. The officers detailed for the court are Col. George D. Scott, Eighth Regiment; Lieut. Col. Louis Fitzgerald, Seventh Regiment, and Major Joseph Holland, of the Brigade Staff. Major David B. Williamson will act as Judge Advocate of the court.

At a recent meeting of the Non-commissioned Officers' Association of the Fourteenth Regiment, Brooklyn, the following civil officers were elected for the ensuing year: President, Lieut. P. J. Bannigan; Vice President, Sergt. James J. Burns; Treasurer, Lieut. John J. Gould; Recording Secretary, Corp. C. W. Luckey; Financial Secretary, Sergt. Alex. Carpenter; Sergeant at Arms, Sergt. A. Jamieson. The third annual invitation ball of this organization will be given at Gallatin Hall, No. 522 Fulton street, Brooklyn, on Thursday evening, Feb. 22.

At a meeting of the Board of Officers of the Ninth Regiment, last Thursday evening, it was decided to give a third concert and hop, for the benefit of the fund for procuring a new uniform for the regimental band, at the armory on Tuesday evening, Feb. 20. The new uniform thus to be provided for the musicians will differ slightly from that now worn by them. The coats will be of red cloth, similar in texture to the white coats worn by the members of the Twenty-second Regiment. The material will be equally serviceable, and will likewise be imported from England for the purpose. The coats will be cut in the "frock" fashion, and will be trimmed in attractive style.

Col. James Cavanagh, commanding the Sixty-ninth Regiment, has appointed John J. Martin Commissary of Subsistence, vice Coonan, whose commission has been vacated, and Michael Breen, Surgeon, vice Nealis. Lieut. Col. Thomas Dempsey has resigned, after nearly 20 years' faithful service in this command. He was elected Captain of Company E on Dec. 9, 1861, and served gallantly with his regiment in its valiant service during the war. On June 29, 1871, he was elected Lieutenant Colonel, and has faithfully performed the duties of that office since that time. Col. Dempsey met with a sad misfortune in the loss of his only son, a young man of 20, in the late destruction of the Brooklyn Theatre.

It has finally been decided by the authorities at Albany to provide a new armament for Battery K, Artillery, First Division, and during the coming Spring the guns now used by that command will be sold for junk, or preserved as relics of antiquity by some enterprising showman. Col. C. B. Mitchell, Chief of Artillery of the First Division, has been ordered out to secure the consummation of this project for a long time, and has received the assurance from Adjutant General Townsend and Inspector General Woodward that new guns of the latest improved pattern shall be supplied at an early date. Lieut. Hoelzle has, therefore, requested the withdrawal of his resignation, and will endeavor to raise the standard of his command to its former elevated position.

The National Rifle Association of England has made another alteration in the targets in use at Wimbledon. The dimensions of the several targets are as follows: 200 yards—"bull's-eye," 6 inches in diameter; "inner," 12 inches; "magpie," 24 inches; and the remainder of the target, which is 4 feet square, will be denominated the "outer," as at present: 500 yards—"bull's-eye," 2 feet; "inner," 3 feet; "magpie," 6 feet; "outer," as at present: 600 yards—"bull's-eye," 3 feet; "inner," 6 feet; "magpie," 12 feet; "outer," as at present. The target, which is 6 feet square, will be denominated the "outer;" at 1,000 yards the dimensions of the target are 6 by 12 feet, the "bull's-eye" being 3 feet in diameter, the "inner" 4½ feet, "magpie" 6 feet square, and the remainder of the target will be termed the "outer." The marking disks will be of the same color and of the same value as those at present in use at Creedmoor.

An election will be held in the Twenty-second Regiment, Col. Josiah Porter commanding, next Friday evening, to fill the vacancy caused by the resignation of Major W. J. A. McGrath. Capt. S. M. Smith, of Company D, is mentioned as being the strongest candidate in the field, and Capt. John H. Horsfall, of Company F, has his supporters for the same office. Private Marvin F. Wood, of Company D, has been appointed Ordnance Sergeant, vice Ferris, warrant vacated. Sergt. Wood appeared in the ranks bearing the insignia of his new rank, at the review and dress parade of the regiment last Wednesday night, an account of which was published in THE TIMES of Thursday, and as he hails from the ranks of a well disciplined company, his promotion will doubtless not end with this office.

The Separate Troop Cavalry, Major Karl Klein, commanding, has not yet removed to its new armory, in West Thirteenth street. A resolution was offered by Alderman Howland, at the regular meeting of the Board of Aldermen, on Thursday, Jan. 25, directing the Commissioner of Public Works to cause the removal of the furniture and property of the troop from its present quarters, in Broadway and Forty-fifth street, to the new armory, in West Thirteenth street. This resolution was laid over until the last meeting of the Board on the 1st inst., and owing to a pressure of other business on that occasion was again laid over. It is considered likely that the resolution will pass at the next meeting of the board. The regular monthly meeting of the troop will take place next Wednesday evening, when several new recruits will be elected to membership.

The Twelfth Regiment has been drilling by wings during the past week. On Monday night the right wing paraded four companies of 12 files front, under command of Major William G. Wilson, and on the following evening Lieut. Col. S. V. R. Cruger drilled the left wing, which was equalized in four companies of 16 files front. Both were solid working drills, and were executed in a manner which reflected credit upon both officers and guides. The manual of arms in the drilling of both wings was fair, but lacks the full snap which should characterize the motions. The manner of fixing and unfixing bayonets was very poorly performed, and commandants of companies would do well to drill their men more carefully in this part of the tactics. The men stood remarkably steady at the command, "parade rest," and after a few more such drills the regiment ought to manifest a decided improvement. The regiment will parade at the State Arsenal for drill next Wednesday evening. Lieut. John O'Rout, Commissary of Subsistence in this command, has tendered his resignation. This command will hold another of its popular "social reunions" at the armory on Tuesday evening, Feb. 13.

At a meeting of the Board of Officers of the Twenty-eighth Regiment, Brooklyn, last Monday evening, the following civil officers were elected for the ensuing year: President, Lieut. Col. F. W. Obernier; Recording Secretary, Lieut. J. Baumgaertner; Financial Secretary, Lieut. Adolf Schmidt; Treasurer, Lieut. Kaesmann. Committees were appointed as follows: Finance—Assistant Surgeon Hesse, Capt. Martens, and Lieut. Steckmann; Music—Surgeon E. A. Groux, Capt. P. Reitzner, and Lieut. Treyz; Armory—Capts. G. Giehl, H. Oetermann, and L. Dobliug; Uniform—Capts. Wandelt, Capt. Anthony Hesse, and Quartermaster Adolph Schmidt. Franz Knick has been appointed Chaplain of this command. The acceptances of the resignations of Col. Joseph Barger and Major Anthony Wills have been received at regimental head-quarters. An election for Colonel and Major will take place at an early date. Lieut. Col. Obernier is the only candidate in the field for the Colonelcy, and Capt. Heerdt, Capt. Giehl, Capt. Ostermann, and Mr. George Wintjen each have their supporters for the position of Lieutenant Colonel and Major.

At First Division Head-quarters, an application has been received from Gen. Ward, commanding the First Brigade, for brevet commissions of Colonel for Lieut. Col. John T. Denny, Assistant Adjutant General of the First Brigade, and Captain for First Lieut. William H. Murphy, Adjutant of the Twelfth Regiment. A commmication has been received from Col. James R. Hitchcock, commanding the Ninth Regiment, returning the commission of Second Lieut. Edmund Lunt, who failed to qualify. Gen. Frederick Vilmar, commanding the Second Brigade, has forwarded the returns of election of Michael J. Bandmann, Second Lieutenant of Company E, Ninth Regiment, vice Japha, promoted, and George W. Homan, Captain of Company H in the same command, vice Hoagland, resigned. A communication has been received from the commandant of Company I, Seventy-first Regiment, requesting the vacation of the commission of Second Lieut. S. E. Perry, owing to his removal from the State. The resignations of Capt. Edwin C. Imlay and Second Lieut. James Shand, of the Seventy-first Regiment, have been received. Capt. Imlay has accepted a position in the United States Signal Service, and Lieut. Shand has removed to the Bermuda Islands. A supernumerary certificate has been reserved for Lieut. George S. Genunda, of the late Fifty-fifth Regiment of Infantry.

An adjourned meeting of the Veteran Association of the Twenty-third Regiment, Brooklyn, took place at the regimental armory last Monday evening, Mr. C. H. Stoddard, the President, in the chair. The Secretary reported an addition to the membership of 26 during the past year. The following Board of Trustees was elected: S. H. Frankum, J. N. Partridge, C. H. Stoddard, R. C. Ogden, C. L. Fincke, S. F. Phelps, Jr., D. W. Van Ingen, W. J. Martin, G. P. Willets, John Lapsley, T. J. Stevens, M. C. Ogden, C. F. Fernauld, A. C. Barnes, E. F. Davenport, W. L. Brownell, George McMillan, A. J. Metz, C. L. Deveuger, W. B. Boerum, R. E. Perkins, and R. T. Shannon, Jr. A committee was appointed to make arrangements for the annual dinner in April. The annual meeting of the association will take place to-morrow evening, when officers will be elected for the ensuing year. The active regiment, Col. R. C. Ward commanding, is under orders to assemble for battalion drill, at its armory, as follows: Friday, Feb. 9; Thursday, Feb. 15; Wednesday, Feb. 21; Thursday, March 8, and Wednesday, March 14. At the close of a drill by Company C of this command last Monday evening, Sergt. W. L. Sandee and Private Charles Pearson, were presented by Capt. H. K. Smith, with the badges won by them at the rifle match held in the armory during the previous week. The third band concert of this command took place at the regimental armory last evening. Prof. Conterno's band was at its best, a large audience was present, and the festivities passed off as successfully as could be desired.

The Third Regiment Cavalry, Col. John H. Budke, commanding, will parade for dismounted drill as follows: Commissioned officers, Thursday, Feb. 1; Thursday, March 1, and Thursday, April 3; non-commissioned officers, Friday, Feb. 2, Friday, March 2, and Wednesday, April 4; Troop A, Monday, Feb. 5, Thursday, Feb. 15, Monday, March 5, Thursday, March 15, Thursday, April 5, and Tuesday, April 17; Troop B, Tuesday, Feb. 6, Friday, Feb. 16, Tuesday, March 6, Friday, March 16, Friday, April 6, and Monday, April 16; Troop D, Wednesday, Feb. 7, Monday, Feb. 19, Wednesday, March 7, Monday, March 19, Monday, April 9, and Thursday, April 19; Troop F, Friday, Feb. 9, Tuesday, Feb. 20, Thursday, March 8, Tuesday, March 20, Tuesday, April 10, and Friday, April 20; Troop G, Friday, Feb. 9, Wednesday, Feb. 21, Friday, March 9, Wednesday, March 21, Wednesday, April 11, and Monday, April 23; Troop H, Monday, Feb. 12, Friday, Feb. 23, Monday, March 12, Thursday, March 22, Thursday, April 12, and Tuesday, April 24; Troop I, Tuesday, Feb. 13, Monday, Feb. 26, Tuesday, March 13, Friday, March 23, Friday, April 13, and Wednesday, April 25; Troop K, Wednesday, Feb. 14, Tuesday, Feb. 27, Wednesday, March 14, Monday, March 26, Monday, April 16, and Friday, April 27. Commandants of companies are directed in orders not to permit new recruits to appear in the ranks at regular company drills or parades, until they shall have been thoroughly instructed in the "School of the Soldier" dismounted. All recruits who have enlisted since March 1, 1876, and all others who have not attended drills regularly, are directed to assemble for special instruction at the armory in Elm street, twice each month, during February, March, and April.

The right wing of the Seventy-first Regiment, comprising Companies H, D, K, and B, Col. Richard Vose commanding, is under orders to parade in fatigue uniform, with white belts, at the State Arsenal, on Monday, Feb. 12, at 8 P. M., for drill and instruction. At the annual election of civil officers in this command, Capt. A. W. Balknap was chosen Treasurer, and Lieut. Robert A. Stevenson Secretary. The following civic committees have been appointed for the ensuing year: Executive, Capt. Amos L. See, Quartermaster Edward C. Ripley, and Commissary Jacob Hess; Music, Lieut. Col. W. H. Chaddock, Lieut W. Milne, Jr., and Lieut. Samuel G. Blakely; Armory, Capt. W. C. Clark, Lieut. R. A. McLaren, and Lieut. Frank S. Belton; Dress, Major E. A. McAlpin, Capt. M. L. Vantine, and Capt. Robert S. Orsor. At an election in Company I of this command, last Monday evening, Second Lieut. W. D. Sheldon, of Company E, was chosen Second Lieutenant. Notice of the reception held by Company K, Capt. Orsor commanding, was crowded out of the military column of last Sunday's TIMES. The entertainment, which took place on Wednesday evening, Jan. 24, was quite a success and gave satisfaction to the members of the company, as well as the large number of invited guests present. Prof. Conterno's regimental bandmaster, supplied a good programme of music for the order of dancing, and a delicate supper was spread in the Board of Officer's room, which was liberally patronized during the evening. Company H, Capt. See commanding, (including sound specially good tin-tails) is may be said that their beauty of shape and plumage made them fit companions for the permanent tropical tenants of the colossal aviary in which this year's pigeon-show is, with great advantage both to the birds and spectators, located."

ICE-BOATS AT BALTIMORE.

The Baltimore Bulletin of Thursday evening says: "The city tugs have been and still are doing good work for the benefit of the port of Baltimore. For several days past they have, under the command of Capt. Collins, been engaged in cutting the ice into small cakes between the harbor and Fort Carroll, and have already widened the channel to the extent of more than 1,200 feet up to a point near Curtis' Creek. The work is being pushed forward to-day, and will not cease until the huge fields of 12-inch ice, which have acted as a barrier to navigation for two months past, is cut up like a checker-board and allowed to pass down and out with the next favorable wind. The work will be extended into the Spring Gardens, where the ice will be cut into small fragments and a wide trank opened to permit the passage of vessels of all descriptions. It is a matter for hearty congratulation that the "toll-gate" as the ice-fields have been called by sailors, is at last being broken up so thoroughly that it must be swept away with the next northwester."

PIGEON-SHOW IN ENGLAND.

Referring to the pigeon-show at the Crystal Palace, London, held recently, the News says: "There were 15 pens of carriers containing 162 birds, nine of pouters with 33 birds, five of barbs with 51 birds, and eight of tumblers containing 220 birds. The above descriptions exhaust what may be called the aristocracy of a pigeon-show, the remaining 37 pens being filled with Jacobins, turbits, owls, dragons, Antwerps, fan-tails, scanderoons, ice-birds, pigmy pouters, &c., none of which, however handsome, are looked upon by the initiated as being anything more than 'toy birds.' The whole collection numbered 1,100 specimens, and was appraised at the sum of £10,000 by the owners. With such large numbers to choose among, and so general an excellence in quality, it is almost invidious to mention names; but as the 'pouters' are by general consent placed at the head of the pigeon community, and as Capt. Hill exhibited some of the best pouters in yesterday's show, a word may be said for his splendid young cock, valued at £50, and which was pronounced by all who saw it to be without a fault. He has length of limb, slimness of girth, roundness of crop—in fact, everything that a pouter should have who meant to win the blue ribbon. His 'rib' was pronounced to be perfection, and his plumage to have all the marks which tanciers most prize, including the perfectly outlined 'moon' or crescent on his breast, and the 'stars' on his shapely and well-feathered wings. The remainder of the pouters had more or less of the above points of excellence, but in no other single case were they so completely combined. The carriers were many of them fine, strong, keen-eyed birds, and on some of the pens the owners had testified in writing that the inmates had done, and could do, 100 miles in a single flight—a not uninteresting statement at a time when the occasional failures of the 'wire' make it desirable that there should be some supplementary means of transmitting intelligence quickly. The barbs and tumblers were of high quality, and of the numerous collection of 'toy' pigeons (including some specially good tin-tails) it may be said that their beauty of shape and plumage made them fit companions for the permanent tropical tenants of the colossal aviary in which this year's pigeon-show is, with great advantage both to the birds and spectators, located."

AN ANXIOUS OLD MAN.

"There came to the Land Office at this place last week," says the Susanville (Cal.) Aavocate, "a man who was born in 1776. His name is Thomas Wash, and that he expects to live for some years yet is evidenced by the fact that he was after homesteads, pre-emptions, &c. The old gentleman was quite indignant when he ascertained that some fellow had filed upon a certain timber tract from which he expected in the far off future to get his supplies of fuel. From the hope he expressed and the ambition that he manifested one would suppose that he had his eye on the next Centennial."

THE PAPACY AND THE CIVIL POWER

THE PAPACY AND THE CIVIL POWER. By R. W. THOMPSON. New-York: HARPER & BROTHERS.

This work, which cannot fail to awaken interest and discussion, was written for the purpose of calling attention to the rapid increase of Catholicism in this country and to the "irrepressible conflict" between the dogmas of the Papal Church, as set forth by the last Ecumenical Council, and the principles upon which our political institutions are founded. In his opening chapters the author brings forward an imposing array of statistics that are calculated to alarm those who hold that the rapid multiplication of the number of our Roman Catholic citizens and the increase of their influence in political affairs must of necessity be fraught with danger to the Commonwealth. Mr. Thompson, it is true, disclaims the character of an alarmist, and evidently endeavors to maintain throughout his work a position of calm historical investigation; but, although his strong Protestant bias is observable on every page, it cannot be denied that he adduces a mass of facts in support of his views that constitute a weighty argument against the Papal Church in its relation to the State, and that may well awaken uneasiness in the minds of all who believe, as the majority of Americans do, that civil liberty can only exist in a community where the affairs of Church and State are held apart by clearly established constitutional barriers.

The line of argument which the author pursues may be very properly divided into three heads: The first based upon a numerical summary of the representatives of the Papacy in this country; the second on a series of extracts from doctrinal utterances of the prelates of the Church, and the third upon the apparent results of the various alliances that have from time to time existed between Church and State.

The growth of the Romish Church in the United States, which Mr. Thompson regards with so much alarm, is of comparatively recent date, as may be seen from the following tabular statement drawn from trustworthy sources:

Number of Protestants in the United States in 1859	21,000,000
Number of Catholics in the United States in 1859	3,500,000
Number of Catholics in the United States in 1868	5,000,000

According to this showing the ratio of increase among Catholics is much larger than that among Protestants, and when the number of educational institutions under the charge of Catholic teachers is considered, there is certainly great propriety in the question which the author so frequently reiterates, "whether or not there is anything in the demands and teachings of the Papacy, which requires that so large a body of the citizens of this country shall put themselves, either now or hereafter, in opposition to the principles we are endeavoring as a nation to perpetuate?"

In answer to this pertinent inquiry, the reader is invited to consider certain extracts from recent Catholic periodicals which, subjected to a clear analysis of their meaning, certainly do not appear to bear the light as they ought to do. The doctrine of unhesitating obedience, as it is taught in the Roman Church, is a familiar idea to all Protestants, yet so persistently have Papal casuists put forth the idea that the obedience claimed was in regard to spiritual matters, and never demanded in opposition to legal obligations binding on the subjects of any non-Catholic Government, that the community has naturally been slow to realize the precise meaning of the tone adopted of late in many Catholic publications. Yet the Catholic World of New-York, a very influential periodical, in an article in which the relative importance of human and divine laws is discussed, has not hesitated to assert that "no matter what human law, what private interests, what dreadful penalties may stand in the way—God must be obeyed, conscience followed, duty must be done. The authority of the State must be braved, human affections must be disregarded, life must be sacrificed, when loyalty to truth and the will of God requires it." This might not appear so startling if it were not remembered that the Roman Church claims the right to direct the conscience of its members, and therefore no law can be binding unless indorsed by the conscience—i. e., the Church. But lest we should be left in any doubt upon the subject, another Catholic essayist tells us:

> "Withdraw the supremacy of the Church from the temporal order, and you deprive the State of that sanction; by asserting that it does not hold from God, and is not amenable to his law, you give the State simply a human basis, and have in it only a human authority, which has no right to govern, and which it is intolerable tyranny to compel me to obey."

By our form of government all the laws have their source, both theoretically and practically, in the will of the people, and are, therefore, of human origin. The Constitution of the United States was ordained and established by the people "in order to form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity." These are the expressions of the honored document, and considered collectively they include everything necessary to the happiness, prosperity, and elevation of a nation; and, with the supreme and sovereign authority of the American people to preserve them for a century, they have thus far proved more conducive to these ends than any of the forms of government where Kings or Popes, or potentates of any name or rank, have had the management of affairs. That this statement is no delusion is abundantly proved by the present condition of the world and the practical results before us.

It would certainly be unjust to say that among the number who cherish this belief there are not many Catholic laymen, and now and then a priest, who have found shelter under our institutions from European misgovernment and monarchical oppression. There are undoubtedly many of this class whom it would be difficult to persuade that the Papacy is in any way endeavoring to substitute an ecclesiastical government in the place of our Republic. Restrained by the sincerity of their own intentions from suspecting others, they never stop to inquire to what probable or possible point they may be led by the uninquiring obedience to their hierarchy which is required of them. During the late rebellion many of this class went into the national armies willingly and promptly, and were as brave and zealous as any others in defending the nation's life and the integrity of the Union. But it cannot be denied that the direct tendency during that crisis of all that came from Rome was to give aid and encouragement to those who were endeavoring to overthrow the Government. And it is equally true that the open avowals of the Pope, so far as they were designed to have political significance, had also the same effect. In no other way can the fact be explained that so large a number of Roman Catholic priests in this country sympathized with all the measures which were designed to break up the Union and destroy our institutions.

That part of his volume which Mr. Thompson devotes to the examination of the real origin of the temporal power of the Pope—whether it was, as Catholics allege, conferred upon St. Peter by the founder of Christianity Himself, or is simply the creation of an ambitious and intriguing hierarchy—cannot fail to interest every student of church history. Authorities on this point are much confused, yet the author claims that by patient investigation the truth may be discovered through all the myths and fables that have been woven into it.

There is nothing upon which ecclesiastical and secular historians better agree than that during the times of primitive Christianity the spiritual and temporal jurisdictions remained distinct, each exercising authority only over those matters which pertained to itself. It is difficult to account for a denial of this fact except upon the ground of ignorance or mendacity. The distinction was preserved for a number of centuries, even in relation to jurisdiction over heretics, which more immediately concerned the Church than anything of a secular nature. The most disturbing element in the early Christian Church was Arianism. This was condemned by the Council of Nice, in 325, because heresy was within the spiritual jurisdiction. But the Council did not undertake to prohibit the circulation of Arian books, because that belonged to the temporal jurisdiction, and was left to Constantine, the Emperor, who did it by imperial edict. In the same manner the Council of Ephesus condemned the heresy of Nestorius, but left the circulation of his books to be prohibited by the Emperor Theodosius. The second Council of Constantinople, in 553, declared Eunomus to be a heretic, but it was the Emperor Arcadius who suppressed his books by imperial law. Says Mr. Thompson:

> "All these councils are recognized by the Roman Church as ecumenical, and as having possessed the highest jurisdiction and authority in the Church—a fact never authoritatively impeached until the decree of Papal infallibility was passed by the late Lateran Council. It will not do for a Papist to say that these councils did not properly understand and define the true relations between the spiritual and the temporal power. And he presumes greatly upon the popular ignorance who asserts that they were changed until that result was produced by Papal usurpations."

At the beginning of the eighth century, Pepin, subsequently King of France, held the position of "Mayor of the Palace" under Childeric III., a lineal descendant of Clovis the Great. Inspired by ambition, he determined, if possible, to place the crown upon his own head, and, being unwilling to proceed by force, he conceived the brilliant idea of bringing to his aid the authority of the Church of Rome. Negotiations were entered into with Pope Zachary, who, seemingly unconscious of his obligation not to employ the sacred influence of religion for the advancement of worldly and ambitious ends, entered into the schemes of Pepin with the greatest alacrity. Without hesitation he declared that it was the will of God that the latter should dispossess Childeric of the crown and wear it himself. In the event of success, it was only natural that the Pope should look to Pepin to reciprocate the obligations he was under to the Holy See. History shows that they were not repudiated; for in 754 Pepin compelled the Lombard King by the force of his armies to hand over to the occupant of the Papal chair a portion of the Lombard territory, which enabled the Pope to assume at once the state of a temporal sovereign. Pepin's example was followed by his son Charlemagne, and various additions were made from time to time, by different sovereigns, to that portion of Italy known until recently as the Papal States.

From the time of Pepin, Mr. Thompson goes on to trace the winding course of European politics, and show how far the fate of nations has been influenced by the ecclesiastical power at Rome. According to his opinion, much that is disastrous and revolting in the history of the civilized world may be directly traced to the wickedness and corruption that had their centre in the Papal hierarchy, which arrogated to itself the right to direct the spiritual and temporal destiny of all mankind. Particularly does he instance France. Writing about the time when that unhappy country lay prostrate before the armies of Prussia, he says:

> "Through the alliance between Zachary and Pepin, and the subsequent donation of the latter to the Church, he acquired the title of 'the favorite son of the Church,' which title has been ever since applied to all the monarchs of France who have proved true to the Church and the Papacy. He was also repaid by the pontifical blessing, and furnished with a copy of the canon laws of the Church, from which it was designed he should learn the nature and extent of his obligations of obedience to the Pope, and the necessity of preserving the union between the State and the Church. And unfortunate has it been for France that this code of canon laws was ever assented to by her great King, or taken by him into her dominions. It tied her fast to the car of the Papacy, and through tribulation, anguish, revolutions, bloodshed, and every form of suffering, it has at last pulled her down into the abyss. The magnificence of her scenery, the grandeur of her cities, the fertility of her soil, the beauty of her climate, the bravery of her armies, the genius of her children, all combined, could not excite in the minds of her people a sufficient sense of their own inalienable birthright. With her face sealed to that of the Papacy, she and it have sunk into a common grave. When her day of resurrection shall come, she must clothe herself in new robes, leave the papal wreck to decay amid the débris of fallen and lost nations, construct with her own hands a new grandeur, and place her people where they are free to be—far forward in the ranks of those who know what it is to shelter and protect themselves by institutions of their own creation, without the aid of Kings or Popes, or any other of the mediæval forms of tyranny."

In regard to our own country, one of the strongest points in Mr. Thompson's argument is drawn from the response of the National Council of the Roman Catholic Hierarchy of the United States to the Encyclical and Syllabus of 1864. Up to that time infallibility was no less a dogma of the Church than it is now; but it was differently deposited. It was the infallibility of the Church when acting through, and by means of, the representative authorities it has recognized for ages, that is, councils and Popes, conjointly. But, through the action of the last Ecumenical Council, the authority of the Church is concentrated in the hands of the Pope alone, at the expense of the representative feature in the Church economy. And lest there should be any doubt in regard to the ground this decree is intended to cover, the Syllabus distinctly states that it does not appertain "to the civil power to define what are the rights and limits within which the Church may exercise authority," and that its authority must be decided upon by itself, that is, by the Pope, and exercised "without the permission and assent of the civil Government." Yet, in the pastoral letter of the National Council, the American prelates took the earliest occasion after the appearance of the Syllabus to show not only that they fully comprehended its meaning, but that the Pope's reliance on their fidelity was not misplaced. Starting with the premise that as "all power is of God," there must exist some delegated authority upon earth, which, representing God, must constitute the tribunal of last resort, this remarkable document goes on to explain that upon this tribunal alone all absolute power is conferred, no matter what the form of government. And whatever of authority the civil magistrate may possess must of necessity be derived from this divinely-inspired source. Thus, according to the "Catholic system of Government," which is explained at some length, because it has this divine authority through the Church, and not in itself, "the State is bound to recognize" the Roman Catholic Church as the sole depository of the delegated power to decide what laws shall be obeyed and what disobeyed.

It requires little pause for reflection to see how directly a "Catholic system of Government" thus constructed would conflict with the existing civil institutions of the United States; yet we cannot agree with Mr. Thompson in believing that in the event of our Government being swayed or even controlled by Catholic influence, we should again experience the horrors of the Middle Ages, or be called upon to endure the re-establishment of the Inquisition. Much that is laid to the credit of the Church of Rome must have arisen out of the state of civilization during that period; and even in the heat of discussion it is well to remember that persecution was as certainly a characteristic of the early Protestant Church as it had ever been of the Catholic. On the other hand, it cannot be denied that there is a source of great danger in the establishment of a hierarchy in the United States whose business it is to inculcate doctrines that are apparently so totally at variance with the principle of self-government upon which our institutions rest. Certainly, as Mr. Thompson urges, it is the duty of every loyal citizen, be he Romanist or Protestant, to interest himself in the inquiry to what extent our civil and religious liberties may be threatened by the present rapid advance of Catholicism in America.

ALFRED B. STREET.

Things move so fast with us that celebrities have to be continually in the front rank or they are jostled out of sight. In picking up the Bildersaal der Welt-literatur of Dr. Johannes Scherr, a voluminous German novelist and essayist, residing, we believe, in Switzerland, we come across some translations of poems by Alfred B. Street, which are used to fill part of the American contingent in the aforesaid picture-hall of world literature. Before the war this would not have attracted any especial notice, but now Mr. Street's name is a reminiscence. There are Bryant's "Thanatopsis," Longfellow's "Excelsior," Drake's "American Flag," and Street's "Settler."

But Holland has also done honor to Mr. Street while his own countrymen were forgetting him. Buddingh, a scholar and antiquarian of the Netherlands, has much to say in his praise in a publication of his travels in the United States, while a London periodical says of "Frontenac" by his hand: "We can best give an idea of Mr. Street's production by saying that it resembles one of Cooper's Indian romances thrown into sweet and varied verse." Vapereau also mentions Mr. Street in his Dictionnaire Universel des Contemporains. The following few lines from "A Forest Walk" show Mr. Street's habit of looking at nature:

> "A narrow vista, carpeted
> With rich green grass, invites my tread;
> Here showers the light in golden dots,
> There sleeps the shade in ebon spots,
> So blended, that the very air
> Seems network as I enter there.
> The partridge, whose dreep rolling drum
> Afar has sounded on my ear,
> Ceasing its beatings as I come,
> Whirrs to the sheltering branches near."

LITERARY NOTES.

—Mr. Murray announces that Dr. Henry Schliemann's Discoveries on the Site of Ancient Mycenæ is in press.

—E. P. Dutton & Co. will republish the late Frederick W. Robertson's Notes on Genesis, and Dr. J. B. Mozley's Ruling Ideas in Early Ages, at an early day.

—The Centennial Monument is the title of a new dramatic work by Nathan Appleton, the recent foreign correspondent of the Boston Globe, which Lockwood, Brooks & Co., will publish at an early day.

—The first portion of Tourguéniet's new novel is agreeable reading to the socialists, and bears a title which is best rendered to English readers by the French word Nouveauté, and which means rather young men than new things.

—Religious people and others are bringing the Orient, by means of sketches of travel, almost to our very doors. The latest announcement is that Rev. Prof. S. C. Bartlett, of Chicago, has nearly ready for the press, as the result of his journey to the East, a volume gathering up his own observations, and the results of what has been discovered and advanced by others up to the present time, bearing on the story of Israel in Egypt, the Exodus, and the Wanderings. It will have the title On the Track of Israel.

—Mr. Bernard Quaritch is the prince of catalogue makers, and his monthly statements of the rare old books and manuscripts in his famous London collection are the most interesting reading which many people ever see. His Catalogue No. 306, for January, 1877, No. 15 Piccadilly, West, London, whets the appetite of the book-collector more than almost any of which he has come to hand for a long time, and Mr. William Downing, No. 74 New street, Birmingham, England, issues original catalogues which are hardly less interesting.

—Roberts Brothers, Boston, will publish, about the middle of February, Keats' Poetical Works, edited by Lord Houghton, who has done many graceful things in literature, but nothing more so than his recent leading of the ceremonies at the unveiling of the Burns statue in Glasgow. They will publish at the same time the third volume in their series of Lander's Imaginary Conversations, which, outside of the expensive but complete London edition, in eight volumes, is the best edition yet brought out in this country.

—The "No Name Series" has been successful as a business venture and as a literary secret. Deirdrè is the only volume whose authorship is known, and even that might have been kept hidden had not a certain critic by too fulsome praise set all the blue-stockings and quidnuncs in Boston agog to guess the authorship. So far, it is true that a publisher can keep a secret like a woman. The authorship of Kismet is not yet truly guessed, and who is the author of the forthcoming Great Match and Other Matches, the next volume in this series, is a question it is almost hopeless to ask.

—The chief article in the February Magazine of American History is Edward F. De Lancey's paper on the capture of Fort Washington in 1776, in which he proves conclusively from documents now for the first time made public that this important post fell through the treachery of an American officer. Rev. Charles F. Baird furnishes a sketch of the first Huguenot Pastor of this City, and there is an original account of the French expedition against St. John's, Newfoundland, in 1705. If this periodical goes on making these "finds" in American history, it will be entitled to the gratitude of scholars and readers.

—Henry C. Baird & Co. will publish next week Outlines of an Industrial Science, by David Syme, editor of The Argus, Melbourne. They have just published an important work by Prof. William D. Wilson, of Cornell University, on The First Principles of Political Economy, with Reference to Statesmanship and the Progress of Civilization. It is a 12mo. book of nearly 400 pages, and grew out of Prof. Wilson's lectures to college students delivered some 20 years ago. The work was evidently a growth in the writer's mind, and Prof. Wilson thinks that, if it has any merits, they are the careful order and arrangement of the topics treated, the clear and precise definitions of the primary facts and principles, and certain broad generalizations which have great scientific interest and practical value. Dr. Wilson is a veteran teacher, and his works on logic and other subjects are valuable treatises. If it shall be found that he has made political economy a clearer subject to students in and out of college, his unpretending book will serve an excellent purpose.

—Porter & Coates, Philadelphia, have the following works nearly ready for publication: Harriet Martineau's History of England from the Commencement of the Nineteenth Century to the Crimean War, in four volumes; A Plea for Art in the House, with special reference to the economy of collecting works of art, and the importance of taste in education and morals, by W. J. Loftie, author of In and Out of London; Suggestions for House Decorations in Painting, Wood-work, and Furniture, by Rhoda and Agnes Garrett; At the North Pole, the voyages and adventures of Capt. Hatteras, by Jules Verne; The Desert of Ice, the further adventures of Capt. Hatteras, by the same author: the "Jules Verne Library," including these and three other volumes of Verne's wonder stories, already published; and Philadelphia Illustrated, a sketch of the City, Fairmount Park, public buildings, and industrial establishments. The same publishers have also in preparation a cheap edition of Wilson's American Ornithology. This is the joint production of Alexander Wilson and Charles Lucien Bonaparte, and gives the natural history of the birds of the United States. It will contain 26 full-page illustrations, and all the figures of birds which are in the larger edition. The production of this work at a moderate price in one volume will do much to forward the study of natural history and protect the birds from destruction both in country and town. Still another enterprise undertaken by this house is the "Frank Nelson Series," by the author of Gun-boat, Rocky Mountain, &c., giving breezy sketches of life in the woods and out of doors. The first volume of this series is called Snowed Up, and the second—which is just published—is Frank Nelson in the Forecastle.

COMPASSIONATE ISRAEL.

THE JEWS' CARE FOR THEIR POOR.

SOCIETIES COMPOSING THE "UNITED HEBREW CHARITIES"—ISRAELITISH INSTITUTIONS — THE ORPHAN ASYLUM — A MODEL INDUSTRIAL SCHOOL—HOME FOR THE AGED—BIKUR CHOLIM'S WORK—MUNIFICENT PRIVATE BENEVOLENCE—A GLORIOUS RECORD.

"As rich as a Jew" runs a proverb familiar the world over, an idle, baleful saying, that, more than any other sentence of equal length, has served to incite the popular prejudice against that ancient race. But there is some excuse for its thoughtless acceptance and use by the masses. Scarcely any Christian ever sees a poor Jew, and many persons will find it difficult to believe that the "chosen people" have not some strange immunity from the woes of impecuniosity. Folks who jump at conclusions from the mere surface facts that come within their observation, and those who mistake shallow knowledge for intuitive perception, will readily assume that Jews attain their supposed uniformity of competence by a selfish devotion to sordid avarice, a universally successful "spoiling of the Gentile." To him, however, who looks deeper into the causes of their seeming general prosperity, it will be apparent that there is among them such widely liberal charity, such noble benevolence and hearty recognition of the ties of a common humanity, as practically exorcises the demon Want from the humblest Jewish hearths, and that this brotherhood, which should have been their crown of glory in all ages and in all lands whither they have been scattered, has, instead, served to give birth to the bitterest and most undeserved reproaches, and even calumnies, against them. The Jew may well be proud of the fact, conspicuous to every inquiring intelligence to-day, that the native nobility of soul in his race has been great enough to resist the blighting influence of centuries of ostracism, persecution, and wrong, and that, instead of developing him into a very Ishmaelite, "his hand against every man, and every man's hand against him," he has still been able to apply to all mankind that sublime teaching of his faith that "charity is but justice." His charity "begins at home," it is true, but does not, like that of most of those who apply that rule, end there. Here, in New-York, he not only keeps today the pledge made to Gov. Stuyvesant, to take care of his own poor, but his hand is opened wide to help his Christian brother provide for his also. Many thousands of dollars annually find their way from Jewish pockets to the coffers of St. John's Guild, the German Society, the German Hospital—which was in large part built by the contributions of wealthy Hebrews—and many other charitable organizations and enterprises upon which he nor none of his ever make any claim. His responses to the extraordinary demands of the suffering upon occasions of great emergency—such as the Chicago fire, the yellow fever plague last Summer in the South, the famines and inundations in Europe—have always been among the most liberal. But the purpose of this article is not, as this plain statement of facts might make it seem, to be a mere glorification of the general benevolence of the Jew. It is rather the giving of some reliable information concerning the means by which he so well cares for his needy and afflicted that the Christian is never burdened by them, and is scarcely ever conscious of their existence.

The Jews are very old residents in New-York. A fair sprinkling of them came over to New-Amsterdam with the Hollanders. But they were not welcome. Old Stuyvesant, the Governor, did not share in the liberal views of William of Orange concerning them. He wrote home for permission to exclude them from his province; he taxed them enormously who in his rule not permitted to kick them out, refused them trade rights, denied them deeds when they bought houses, even denied them a burial ground. There was but one thing that he willingly accorded them, the right to take care of their own poor, the which they pledged themselves to do, and has been amply, have done ever since. In 1696, when they built their first synagogue in this City, there were only 20 Jewish families here. But after that date, so liberal was their treatment and so thorough did the recognition of their equal rights with other citizens gradually become, that their numbers very rapidly increased. To-day the Jewish population of New-York numbers over 7,000, comprises some of our wealthiest and most enterprising merchants, manufacturers, and bankers; is deservedly prominent in its refinement and enlightened patronage of art, literature, and science; and for its worship occupies no less than 30 synagogues, some of which are of great magnificence. Of this is on the surface. Let us see what is beneath, the germ of which the Jews prove themselves capable, and of which they make no parade.

THEIR SOCIETIES OF CHARITY IN NEW-YORK.

The oldest charitable organization, the Hebrew Benevolent Society, was organized as long ago as 1822. Up to that time, whenever a Jew appeared who needed aid, his coreligionists supplied it liberally by private donations without any formality. But in 1822, one who had been a soldier in the American war of the Revolution, then old, poor, and a stranger, died in the City Hospital, leaving unexpended some $300 of the money contributed by his brethren for his care. The possession of that money suggested to some liberal Jewish citizens of Portuguese and English extraction the idea of making it the nucleus of a permanent fund to aid the needy. That was the start of the association mentioned, in 1822. It was not, however, until ten years later that it was incorporated by act of the Legislature. In 1845 the next oldest of those societies, the German Hebrew Benevolent, which was also known as the Society of Brotherly Love, came into being, and in 1859 these two organizations were consolidated. Their united funds amounted to nearly $25,000, with which they at once proceeded to establish a Jewish Orphan Asylum, further reference to which will be made in another part of this article. The Hebrew Benevolent Society has now about 2,500 members, of whom some 800 are "patrons," contributing $25 per annum each, while the dues of the others are but $10 each per annum. Their receipts from all sources during the past year were $9,114 88, and they figured up the cheering backing of $127,331 49 available assets besides. Last year they donated $6,000 in cash—about their annual quota—to the central confederation of charitable societies, having that sum to spare from maintaining the Orphan Asylum. The present President is Mr. Jesse Seligman.

The Hebrew Benevolent Fuel Association was organized about 10 years ago, for purposes sufficiently set forth by its title. It has about 500 members now, and some idea of the extent of its benefactions may be gained from the fact of its distribution of 425 tons of coal already this Winter, through the central organization. Mr. S. Rothschild is President.

The Ladies Hebrew Benevolent Society of Yorkville, organized five years ago, has 200 members, who, in addition to private charitable work of their own, contribute annually $500 to the uses of the central organization. Mrs. M. L. Stieglitz, is their presiding officer.

The Hebrew Relief Society dates back fully 30 years. It was formed among the members of the Portuguese Jewish Congregation "Shearith Israel," who are not only very liberal in maintaining their own poor, but donate $500 per annum to the general charities of the central body. Mr. H. S. Allen, is President.

The Young Ladies' Charitable Union was started about five years ago for the explicit purpose of supplying fuel to the poor. It has now 150 members, and donates $500 annually, through the central organization, to relieve the wants of the bare-footed. Miss Bella Richman is its President.

The Ladies' Benevolent Society, Gates of Prayer, is an organization within the body of Rev. Dr. Mendes' congregation, Shaaray Tefila, and was formed about 15 years ago with the ostensible purpose of furnishing groceries and coal to the destitute. Now, however, its members apply themselves to the general relief of their own poor, and, in addition, contribute $500 annually to the central work of charity. Mrs. H. Morrison is President.

The six societies named send delegates to a central confederation, which systematizes and applies relief in the most thorough manner among the Jewish poor all over the City. The first named has a dozen representatives, the second but two, and the others only one each. This gives a board of eighteen, whose organization is known as the Board of Relief of the United Hebrew Charities. Their offices are at No. 13 St. Mark's place. In a general way, it may be said that their system of benefactions resembles that adopted by other organizations of kindred character. The City is divided into eight districts, and any application for relief is referred to the delegate in charge of the particular district from which the demand is made. That delegate must visit the applicant, thoroughly investigate the case, and conscientiously report thereon to the Executive Committee, which meets every Tuesday evening, and by that body the relief is ordered. In affording relief, the object in view is not the mere determination of how little the impoverished person can be put off with, but what he or she actually needs, and that arrived at, the required assistance is promptly afforded, whatever may be its nature or amount. Not only are dollars, tons of coal, articles of clothing, bedding, &c., provided, but also the means to render the poor self-supporting. Sewing-machines are furnished, employment is found, material for small handicrafts is often supplied—nothing, in short, is left undone to maintain as far as possible the personal independence and self-reliance of the person assisted, the charity accorded being so given that, instead of humiliation in its acceptance, the recipient may feel only a sense of happiness and encouragement in the tangible proof of brotherly sympathy. Strangest and most unchristianlike of all the operations of the United Hebrew Charities, the work of its Loan Committee. These eccentric people actually lend money in sums of from $25 up to $150 to help poor Jewish artisans to buy tools and small outfits of stock for working up into salable articles and outfits for trading—in fact for every way in which, upon a small capital, there may be a reasonable hope of earning an honest livelihood. Where a larger capital is required, say $1,000, $2,000, $3,000 or $5,000, that too will be promptly forthcoming from the ample means of private individuals, who take pleasure in thus aiding their fellow-men. The Loan Committee has not sufficient funds at its disposal to enable it to undertake these larger contracts in business, but none seem so universally known as he, none appear to have so devoted themselves to that enjoyment so well expressed in a German poet's words—"The greatest pleasure of all pleasures is to help."

To give some idea of the extent of the work of the United Hebrew Charities, during the fiscal year ending May 1, 1876, they distributed $36,030 21; gave away 745 tons of coal, 716 pairs of shoes, and 1,625 women's and children's garments; supplied 1,000 poor widows with sewing-machines; sent 241 persons, old, invalid, and poor, to different parts of Europe; cared for a monthly average of 12 orphans; and, in medicines, nurses, loans, and other small items, managed to dispose of about $3,000 more. Since the 1st of May last they have had 1,800 applications for charity, but one of which was refused, and that was made by a fraud, who had been helped once before, when he, as was afterward discovered, had money in bank. Such cases are extremely rare. This year's percentage, one in 1,800, being deemed very high. During December last, $3,592 76 worth of coal were given away. Sixteen persons were also forwarded to their homes, of whom five had to be sent to Liverpool and five to San Francisco. As will be seen by these merely indicative notes, the contributions of the several societies mentioned do not supply all the "sinews of war" for this central organization. The balance required is furnished by large voluntary contributions from the several congregations, and from individuals outside the synagogues, or by returns from entertainments of some sort, as for instance a grand ball last month, which netted $8,000. But, wherever the money comes from, it is never lacking. Not only is the treasury never emptied, but each fiscal year opens with a respectable balance on hand. One thing more connected with this "out-door poor" work should not be forgotten—the Hebrew Free Burial Society. Having done all possible to help along the distressed brother through life, the Jew does not relinquish his care of him until he is respectably interred. This society furnishes hearses, coaches, shrouds, coffins, &c., a complete outfit—not for what might be called a stylish send-off, but a plain, decent funeral. It has a burial-ground near the Cypress Hills Cemetery, where it is called upon to bestow on an average something over 220 bodies annually. Comparatively few of these are adults, so that expenses are low, averaging probably $10 for each funeral at the present time. Three years ago the average cost was only $7 81.

This much having been said of the public and most prominent organized Jewish forms of relief for the poor of that people, let us see next what they do in the way of maintaining charitable institutions of their own.

THE HEBREW ORPHAN ASYLUM.

The place of honor may well be accorded to the Hebrew Orphan Asylum, under the charge of the eminent Rev. Dr. Herman Baar. It is properly divisible for purposes of consideration, into three parts, the Orphan Asylum proper, the Industrial School, and the House of Reception. The first of these is a fine three-story brick building, capable of accommodating 300 inmates, erected in 1862 at a cost of $50,000, located upon a plot of ground fronting 400 feet on Seventy-seventh street, and 102 feet in depth, given by the City. Between the institution and the Third avenue is a large garden, beautiful in Summer time with a profusion of flowers. On the other side, toward Lexington avenue, is a play-ground. There are at present in the institution 170 boys, of whom 45 are between the ages of 4 and 7 years. These little fellows are taught in a home school, by Mr. Oppenheimer. Those between 7 and 16 years of age are sent to the common schools. Out of 70 boys sent from the Institution to the Seventy-ninth Street Grammar School, 65 were, on Wednesday last, promoted, and of these, 20 "jumped a class"—a pretty good exhibit of their smartness and capability for learning. After graduating in the common schools, some of them are provided with homes where they may learn business, others are apprenticed, either in the Industrial School or to artisans outside, a few are adopted by childless people, and the brightest are sent to college to prosecute their studies still further. There are now in the New-York College, all of whose expenses are borne by this institution. After returning from the common schools, the boys are instructed daily, from 4 to 6 o'clock, by Mr. Lazarus, in Hebrew and German. They also have drawing lessons once and gymnastics twice each week.

In points of cleanliness and discipline, the asylum is a model, and the appearance of the boys is sufficient evidence that they get abundance of good food, comfortable clothing, and kind treatment. They take quite a pride in their appearance. To cultivate this feeling they have been drafted into thirteen military companies, each officered from among the boys, and these companies pass through a rigid inspection each morning, to see that every boy is clean, tidy, and presentable at school. Then, they march off by the right flank to their studies. A brass band has also been organized among the boys, and they have learned to play really well. All the clothing and linen used in the Asylum is supplied and made up by the Ladies Sewing Society, 70 or 80 members of which meet here every Wednesday to sew from 10 A. M. to 3 P. M. for this purpose.

The Industrial School, is a three-story and high-basement building, 75 by 38 feet, in the rear of the Asylum, where 25 apprentices are taught the art and mystery of printing, and nine learn the trade of making shoes. Mr. S. Arnheim, the principal of the school, is an enthusiastic printer, who has worked in the first job offices of France, Germany, England, and Ireland, and has won a gold medal in a typographical contest in London, by his extraordinary taste and thorough knowledge of his art. He takes a particular delight in making thorough workmen of his apprentices, and some of the jobs turned out by them, especially in very fine color printing, may well excite the admiration of the oldest and most skilful typographers. Each apprentice is taught, not merely to be a compositor, or a pressman, or a color printer, but all branches, and it is hoped that ere long lithography will be added to their course of instruction. The office stock is good, consisting of five power-presses, a complete job outfit, and at least a year's supply of material for book work. The generous donation of $1,080 worth of material by Mr. Jesse Seligman, in 1870, was the start of this branch of industrial education. Now it is almost self-supporting, would indeed be quite so were its object more profit instead of the thorough instruction of the boys. The Dramatic News, Amateur Artisan, Forrester's Journal, and one or two other periodicals are printed here. To the credit of the Principal it should be said that he does not bring his office into competition with regular establishments by cheapening work, as is sometimes done in such institutions. Good work is worth good pay, "a part of the education" he gives his apprentices. They, by the way, receive remuneration in proportion to their progress, and some of them save up quite handsome sums. The Assistant Principals are Mr. I. Furst, in the printing, and Mr. W. H. Rice, in the shoe-making department. The boys under the latter gentleman's control make all the shoes used in the institution.

On Eighty-sixth street, between Second and Third avenues, is the House of Reception, a branch of the Orphan Asylum, for the care of female orphans and half-orphans. It is a large three-story building, rented at a cost of $1,800 per annum, pending the accumulation of funds sufficient for the erection of a more suitable edifice by the Directors of the Orphan Asylum. It shelters at present 91 inmates between the ages of 5 and 15 years, under charge of Mrs. Seligman. The girls are also, like boys, given a thorough common-school education. At home they are taught housekeeping, needle-work, millinery, &c. As they become old enough they are readily placed in good homes, or are apprenticed to some handicraft for which they have a preference and taste.

The cost of conducting these three branches of the Orphan Asylum the last fiscal year was $86,785 83, exclusive of clothing. The solid foundation upon which the institution stands is evidenced by the possession of a surplus of $127,360 50, of which $76,400 were invested in profitable bonds and mortgages, on May 1, 1876. A little over $32,000, was that year received from the City, which allows $110 for the annual maintenance of each orphan legally the City's charge. That is about $70 each less than the cost of keeping them as they are kept here. A great deal of good is done in the way of saving orphans' estates and collecting for them the money on life insurances on the lives of their parents, by the Directors of the institution. None of the funds so obtained are touched. They are simply put into savings banks until their rightful owners become of age.

THEIR FIRST LOCAL INSTITUTION FOR THE SICK.

Under the name of the Jews' Hospital, the first institution established by the Hebrews for the care of the sick in this City was opened in 1855 on Twenty-eighth street, between Seventh and Eighth avenues. That building was soon found to be too small to meet the requirements upon it. The City then granted, for 99 years, the lease of a plot of ground fronting 200 feet on Lexington avenue and 170 feet on Sixty-sixth street; wealthy Hebrews contributed the means to erect a suitable edifice upon it, and in 1870 the corner-stone of the present magnificent Mount Sinai Hospital was laid. A year later it was opened. It had cost nearly $375,000. To-day, it stands among the very first of such institutions in the land in perfection of arrangement, munificence of provision, intelligent and successful treatment of its inmates. Here, although a denominational institution, with a synagogue within its walls, where Jewish services are conducted weekly, there is absolutely no restriction of race or creed to bound the work of charity. Protestant, Catholic, Pagan, and Jew derive equal rights upon it from the one common ground of suffering. As a regular thing, at least 24 per cent. of its inmates are Christians. And when death's hand touches one, or the fear of death excites an abnormal interest in his mind about the possibilities of the future, a clergyman or priest of his chosen denomination is sought and brought to his bed-side to soothe and comfort him. One hundred and fifty patients can easily be accommodated, and even 200 may be cared for in case of necessity. The daily average has been the average was 114.98, a large increase upon that preceding. Only 50 were pay patients, and 1,466 were treated gratuitously. The death rate was but about 5 per cent., an exceptionally good record, when it is taken into account that here, as in the most liberal of general hospitals, many utterly hopeless cases are brought in, such as consumptives, incurables, and the victims of accidents. Three-fifths of the inmates are men. There are rules requiring pay from those who are able to pay, but of the 125 sick persons in the wards to-day all are being cared for gratuitously, and only six private rooms—for which $50 or $75 per month are charged—have occupants. In connection with the hospital, a free dispensary is maintained, at which medicine and professional treatment are afforded to the poor, without distinction as to sect, free of cost. A great deal is also done for the alleviation of the distress of needy out-door sick, unable to attend the dispensary, and who cannot, by reason of contagious diseases, or for other sufficient causes be admitted to the hospital. Such cases are either reported by friends of the sufferers, met with by the members of the Ladies' Auxiliary Society—who not only do all the sewing for the institution, but go about like ministering angels to find cases worthy of succor—are discovered in the course of the indefatigable Mr. Seligman Solomon's explorations. The cost of maintaining the Mount Sinai Hospital during the past year was $52,323 96 in cash, independent of very considerable donations of necessary material for its service. As a substantial guarantee of the future, the treasurer's last report sets forth the possession of $33,099 88 cash in hand, and $77,595 invested securely in good bonds and mortgages, yielding a handsome revenue. Mr. L. B. Simon is Superintendent, Mr. Adolph Hallgarten, President of the society. Since the inception of this enterprise the wealthiest and most generous of our resident Hebrews have been closely associated with its management and liberal in its support. One of these—whose tragic and mysterious death gave notoriety to his name beyond all the good achieved in his long and useful life—was Benjamin Nathan, of whom a very fine portrait is in the Directors' room of the hospital. Another of the founders of the institution was John I. Hart, and they have a picture of him, too—an inexpressibly bad one.

SPECIAL CARE OF THE AGED.

On Avenue A, at the corner of Eighty-seventh street, is a large and handsome frame building, the Home for Aged and Infirm Hebrews. It was once the Astor mansion, and still stands upon ground belonging to the Astor estate, but belongs now to Col. Hildebrand and is rented for $3,500 per annum; taxes and repairs, however, as the cost of the tenant, amounts to about $500 more. It is in a charming location, surrounded by ample grounds, which are very beautiful in the Summer time, and is backed by a fine grove, in which the inmates of the home have the privilege of rambling. The back windows command a fine view of the East River shallows,

A GREAT OFFER

THE SECURITY LIFE COMPANY.

VICE PRESIDENT WETMORE GIVES BAIL IN $20,000 — DISAPPEARANCE OF THE ACTUARY.

Theodore R. Wetmore, Vice President of the Security Life Insurance Company, left his residence at New-Hamburg, Dutchess County, yesterday morning, and came to the residence of his father, Appollos R. Wetmore, No. 33 West Ninth street, in this City. Both gentlemen then proceeded to the District Attorney's office to give bail on the indictment for embezzlement which had been found against the younger Wetmore. The indictment, which was read over to the accused official, charges that he, Theodore R. Wetmore, on Nov. 29, 1876, while in the service of the Security Life Insurance and Annuity Company, appropriated to his own use the sum of $4,400, represented by the following check:

No. 3,528.

Leather Manufacturers' National Bank:
Pay to Alexander Barton, Cashier, or order, $4,400.
THEODORE R. WETMORE, Vice President.
ISAAC H. ALLEN, Secretary.

It is charged that Mr. Wetmore appropriated this sum to his own use, and is therefore indicted for grand larceny and embezzlement. Judge Gildersleeve fixed bail at $20,000, the same amount as was given in the case of Isaac H. Allen. Counsel for Wetmore moved for a reduction of bail, and after an argument from Assistant District Attorney Lyon, the motion was denied. Wetmore's father then justified in the necessary amount, and was accepted as bondsman for his son. The accused official was then formally released.

It was expected that Robert L. Case, Sr., President of the company, would also appear and give bail. In the afternoon, however, a note was received from his lawyers stating that he could not come to town, but would appear to-morrow and give bail. It is not probable that the Actuary, Robert L. Case, Jr., will put in an appearance, he having, it is said, left the State.

THE CONTINENTAL LIFE.

ARGUMENT IN THE SUPREME COURT RELATING TO THE RECEIVERSHIP OF THE COMPANY—MR. JOHN J. ANDERSON SUSPENDED FROM THE POSITION OF RECEIVER—AN UNOBJECTIONABLE PERSON TO BE SELECTED IN HIS STEAD.

The troubles of the Continental Life Insurance Company and its Receiver, Mr. John J. Anderson, came up before Judge Pratt, in the Supreme Court, Brooklyn, yesterday, on the return to the order issued on Thursday to the parties in interest to show cause why the prayer of Mr. Anderson's petition asking that his resignation be accepted should not be granted. Counsel were present in large numbers, representing the different policyholders who have brought suits against the insolvent company. Mr. John L. Hill, in behalf of the Receiver, stated that he had served notice of Mr. Anderson's application on all persons who had instituted proceedings against the concern, and had mailed notice thereof to the Attorney General and to the Superintendent of the Insurance Department. Mr. Hill, in addressing the court, said that while Mr. Anderson felt he had honestly tried to do his duty, yet the circumstances attending the performance of it forced him to the conclusion that he was not satisfactory to those interested in the fund. He desired, therefore, as had been set forth in his petition, that some person should be appointed in his stead who would restore confidence. Mr. Hill suggested that the order of the court provide that the Receiver's bond remain in force, without prejudice to any of the parties interested, until the bond filed by his successor be approved, and that, inasmuch as part of Mr. Anderson's accounts were already before Mr. William Allen Butler, as Referee, he pass upon them on the Receiver retiring.

Mr. Raphael J. Moses, counsel for Stephen English and other policy-holders, said the Receiver's accounts had not yet gone before the Referee, and it would be somewhat precipitate to allow him to retire before the court knew how his duties had been performed. He would therefore suggest that Mr. Anderson be merely suspended, and that it be left to Mr. Butler, the Referee, to nominate his successor by Monday. They wanted a man of spotless reputation for integrity, and one who would honestly administer the trust reposed in him.

Judge Pratt remarked that it was not very probable he would appoint a man to the position of Receiver who was of improper character.

Mr. Warren, another of the counsel, thought the matter should be left to the discretion of the court. He had been trying, he said, for a long while to get a look at the books of the concern, but had been unsuccessful until after Mr. Butler had been appointed Referee. Since then he had been allowed to see them, and such corruption, fraud, and iniquity had been disclosed. The Receiver or the concern, who had covered this up so far, had done the best thing he could under the circumstances—got out. Mr. Warren suggested as his successor Mr. E. Z. Lawrence, of the firm of Collender & Lawrence.

Gen. Tracy, representing over $1,000,000 of the funds, said that pending an application for a Receiver in October last, a Director of the company received $13,560 from Oct. 21 to Oct. 23, while he was indebted to the company $38,950 for money borrowed. Five lawyers received $10,233 pending the order for a Receiver, and two Directors borrowed money a few days before the company's failure on the stock of the company. Such a condition of things made this court responsible to the public and the policy-holders for any failure to appoint a person who would sift the whole history to the bottom. If there was not money to be refunded to the swindled policy-holders by those who had the handling of it, then courts of law had better be abolished. The person appointed Receiver should be one whose every name and character, the result of a life of industry and integrity, should be a guarantee of fidelity and vigor in the administration of the funds. No unknown man, no man selected beforehand would do, for the court must stake its reputation on the selection. This was a personal responsibility which his Honor could not refer. If they could have such a man as Samuel McLean, Charles Storrs, George L. Nichols, or Austin Corbin, counsel would feel that the affair was safe. But he hoped his Honor would appoint no one without personal inquiry as to his responsibility and character, and as to his freedom in social relations to compel any one who had funds of the policy-holders to restore them.

Mr. Warren indorsed what Gen. Tracy said. No one who had ever had anything to do with any Directors of the Continental was a fit person to be Receiver. Even stockholders who have received dividends since the corporation was insolvent, were liable to pay back what they had so received.

State Insurance Superintendent Finch, of Indiana, who was present as the representative of about 250 policy-holders, said he agreed with the two gentlemen who had preceded him. The Receiver should be a man known beyond the limits of the State of New-York. He would therefore suggest the names of Hon. William Barnes, Superintendent of the Insurance Department in this State from 1860 to 1870; or Augustus W. Smith, who had organized the Kentucky Insurance Department, and who had driven the Continental from that State long before other Superintendents had thought of examining its condition.

Justice Pratt inquired whether the gentlemen had considered the advisability of having more than one Receiver, and all seemed to be agreed that one would be better. The suggestion was made that a clause be put in the order of the court that no counsel fees should be paid by the Receiver except by order of the court. The names of several other gentlemen, among them Wilson G. Hunt, Charles M. Fry, Mr. Aaron Claflin, Mr. Sanger, and Mr. Howell, were submitted as suitable persons for the position made vacant by the resignation of Mr. Anderson, after which Mr. Moses asked that an order be entered suspending the Receiver pending the decision of the court, stating that he ought to have prevented the transfer by the New-Jersey Mutual Life Insurance Company of the assets of the Continental held by it to the National Capitol Company.

The court directed that an order be entered suspending the Receiver until the further order of the court, and that he be enjoined and restrained from paying out, transferring or in any manner interfering with the property of the corporation, except to preserve it, until the entry of such further order. The hearing in the matter will be resumed to-morrow.

ARRIVAL OF SHIPWRECKED SAILORS.

The British steam-ship Hadji, Capt. Tobin, six days from Havana, arrived at this port yesterday, and has begun to discharge her cargo, consisting principally of sugar, at the Congress street wharf, Brooklyn. At Havana, the Hadji took on board eight seamen, of the British ship David G. Flemming, which was wrecked on Jan. 1 off Colorado Reefs. The names of the men are as follows: Edward McPhail, John McDonald, George Parrot, Angelo Butler, Peter Johnson, Thomas Griffiths, John Sennington, and John McEvoy. The ship Flemming was from Liverpool, bound for Mobile, and had a cargo of salt as ballast, which, with the vessel, was a total loss. The officers of the Hadji speak very disparagingly of these sailors, and say that it was impossible to get any information from them. They promised to pay for their passage by helping to unload the cargo, but left the vessel as soon as she got to port.

A WARNING TO "STRIKERS."

On Thursday afternoon last, Bernard Tracy, in company with several other "striking" longshoremen, attacked Henry Neilson, and seriously injured him. Neilson was on his way to a ship with a message, when he was met, at the foot of Carlisle street, by Tracy and other laborers, who asked him if he was going to work on the dock at the reduced rates. He replied that it was none of their business, and was immediately knocked down and beaten. Tracy was the only one of his assailants arrested. He was brought before the Court of Special Sessions yesterday, and sentenced to the Penitentiary for six months. At the solicitation of his wife, the Court recalled him, and lessened his term of imprisonment to three months.

KING CARNIVAL'S FESTIVAL.

COMING MASQUERADE OF THE GERMAN LIEDERKRANZ CLUB—GREAT POWERS AND SMALL POWERS IN HARLEQUIN DRESS—THE INAUGURAL PROCESSION—A FORETASTE OF THE FEAST OF FUN.

King Carnival may not be at home with the citizens of New-York at all times and at all seasons, but experience has demonstrated that with one class of the community, at least, he is a favorite, and this class has succeeded by persistence and a magnificent way of introducing their favorite, in at least making him thoroughly attractive and popular for one night in the year. The absurdly humorous festival in honor of the Carnival King which has yearly been celebrated by the German Liederkranz Club, will, this year, on Thursday evening next, be observed with all the careful, elaborate preparations and entire devotion to the spirit of fun which have characterized it so many seasons before. No temporary depression of trade, no political complication or annoyance at home, no distressing muddle of foreign nations, in the least embarrasses the moving spirits in this harlequin festival. Rather the contrary, for the complications are seized upon by them with a keen sense of humor, and the greatest problems are solved by them in pantomime in such a manner that even the most obstinate partisan, looking upon the scene mimicked by the jolly fellows of the German Liederkranz Carnival, must relax his visage if he do not endanger his sides with laughter. As on previous occasions, the labor of preparation has been intrusted to skillful hands. The Academy of Music will be decorated, and the machinery for the performance of the elaborate pieces under the direction of competent persons, and committees of men experienced in such matters, will carry out all the details of preparation thoroughly and in a liberal spirit. Many of the most prominent German citizens of New-York lend their names to the occasion, to give to its patrons assurance of its entire respectability. In addition to the Academy of Music, upon the floor of which the grand carnival procession and the dancing will be seen, Nilsson Hall will be occupied as a grand supper-room, and tables will also be spread in the supper-room of the Academy. An orchestra and a promenade band, led respectively by Bernstein and Leibolds, will furnish the music, which will begin at 9 o'clock, but the grand entrée of the inaugural procession will not take place until 10 o'clock. The floral decorations will probably be of a more than usually elaborate character, and a number of novelties in the decorative line are hinted at rather than disclosed, as if to enhance the enjoyment of the occasion by agreeable surprises. The committee to prepare the order of opening ceremonies are reported to have held a stormy but finally harmonious session, and decided at length upon a programme which will be carried out to its minutest particulars, no matter how painfully it may grate upon the feelings of those who may happen to feel themselves injured by subjection to caricature. At 10 o'clock the procession, headed by the Czar and Suitan, who have been harmonized "for this occasion only," will begin to move. These majesties personages will be followed by a Peruvian, an Alligator, and a Palmetto Tree, symbolizing the "doubtful States"—that were—and, very properly, the Georgia Jubilee Singers will follow the doubtful States, clad in white robes, and singing "Hold the Fort." It does not speak well for the judgment of the Committee of Arrangements that they have put all the bands of music who desire to honor King Carnival together, but they have done so, and the jubilee singers will be followed by the Orphan Boy Choir singing "So say we all of us." This favorite company of vocalists will be followed by their leaders the pain of excellence, while they will in turn be bound to compete with the Wissahickon and Egg Harbor Silver Cornet Band, playing "Siegfried's Tod." A Congressional delegation in harlequin costume—not strange habiliments to a few—will introduce Pinchback as the "Essence of Ole Virginny," and Senators Morton and Sherman are announced to appear in their unrivaled "Shoo Fly." From over the sea the Constantinople conference will come to be served up in Donnybrook style, while Morton, Sherman & Co., who appear to be possessed of versatile accomplishments, will reappear in penitential garments, chanting the "Miserere." The edifying spectacle of Senator Conkling, as Hercules crushing the head of the Party Hydra, will follow, and Mayor Ely will next appear, conducting a new and remarkable machine for street-cleaning, which will doubtless be looked upon with a good deal of interest in remembrance of the condition of the City streets. An astonishing exhibition will be that in the procession of a model of a Brooklyn ferry-boat that can cross the East River in Winter within two hours, and having shown the admiring audience how that desirable feat can be accomplished, Rev. Dr. Talmage will be shown in the commendable act of blowing up Hell Gate, King Carnival having heard of that divine's capacity for blowing up things generally. A cruel spectacle will be that of ex-President Grant marching on Galena by way of St. Louis, while persons who feel the Philadelphia malaria lingering in their bones will be invigorated by the exhibition of a number of Centennial visitors, put up in jars of Schuylkill water and shaking with malarial fever. Everybody will be delighted with the next object in this curious procession, which is truly a genuine curiosity, being nothing less than a piano which did not receive the first prize at Philadelphia. Although it is possible this order will not be strictly adhered to, public opinion demands that one more curiosity promised will surely be produced; this is a hotel clerk who can please everybody, can lead in prayer, play draw-poker, match worsteds, shake for drinks, play billiards, waltz, dance the German, repeat the Beecher trial from memory, is a good judge of horses, an infallible railroad guide; will flirt with any young lady, can find room for 40 people when the house is full; attend to the annunciator, and answer questions in Greek, Choctaw, Irish, or any other language, and all this without turning a hair. This clerk is to be guarded by a detachment of Police, as he has been secured for the White House, and is to be followed by small boy delegates from the great powers of Europe and Australia. Enough may be gathered from this to convey an impression of what will be done for the entertainment of the patrons of the Liederkranz ball, but a number of special exhibitions of a unique and expensive character are held to reserve and will be announced before the eventful night.

BURGLARS AT WORK.

The residence of Mr. William H. Hurlbut, No. 25 East Thirty-seventh street, was visited by a gang of expert house thieves on Friday evening. While the family were at dinner in the basement the thieves climbed up the columns of the front portico, and entered the house through a second-story window. Stepping into the bedroom of Mrs. Hurlbut they forced open the bureau drawers and thoroughly ransacked the apartment, securing money and jewelry to the value of over $500. They made their escape from the house in the same way in which they had entered. There were five men engaged in the operations, of whom stood on guard on the sidewalk while their companions robbed the house. The thieves were followed by Upton B. Jenkins, a colored man, who had noticed their movements, and at Thirty-sixth street and Madison avenue he met Officer Gillespie, of the Twenty-ninth Precinct, and, with the assistance of the colored man, the officer succeeded in arresting two of the thieves, but their companions escaped. The prisoners gave their names as John Wilson and George Brown, and on being arraigned before Justice Murray, at Washington Place Police Court, yesterday, were committed for trial in default of $3,000 bail each. None of the stolen property was recovered.

ARREST OF AN ALLEGED SWINDLER.

Detective Dolan, of the Fifteenth Precinct, yesterday arrested Albert C. Couch, who claims to be a resident of Providence, R. I., and who is charged with having passed a worthless check for $75 on Mr. Oakley S. Barker, of No. 1,465 Broadway. When the accused was arraigned before Justice Murray, at the Washington Place Police Court, Mr. Barker made affidavit that Couch, with whom he had been acquainted for some time, called on him on the 20th ult., and asked him to cash the check referred to, which was drawn on the Chicopee National Bank of Springfield, Mass., to the order of Walter Foster, purporting to be signed by J. A. Biggs, and indorsed by Foster. Couch represented the check as being perfectly good, and Mr. Barker, through Dr. Augustus W. Brown, of No. 3 Great Jones street, obtained the money from the East River National Bank, and handed it to Couch. In due course of business the check was presented at the Chicopee Bank and was dishonored, no such person as Biggs having an account there. Couch subsequently admitted that he knew the check was worthless when he obtained the money for it. He was held for trial in default of $2,000 bail.

SUPPOSED SUICIDE OF A BUTCHER.

Late on Friday night John Saeger, a German grocer, was found dead in his store, No. 418 Ninth avenue. The body was in a leaning position against a meat block, with an ice-pick sticking in the left breast. A post-mortem examination showed that death had undoubtedly been instantaneous, the pick having penetrated the heart. While the circumstances tend to establish the belief that Saeger committed suicide, his wife is of the opinion that his death was purely accidental. At 7 P. M. he was in good spirits, and between that hour and 10 P. M. chatted pleasantly with her and their four children. Shortly after 10 he went into his store for the purpose of cutting meat, and the floor on which he stood being very slippery from grease, she believes that he fell on the ice-pick, which he happened to have in his hand at the moment. Mrs. Saeger admits, however, that although doing a fair business, Saeger was nevertheless financially embarrassed.

OFF FOR AUSTRALIA.

EMIGRATION FROM THE UNITED STATES TO NEW-SOUTH WALES—DEPARTURE OF THE BARK N. BOYNTON WITH NINETY-NINE PASSENGERS.

Yesterday afternoon the first load of emigrants from this to a foreign country left this port for Australia. The Colonial Government of New-South Wales, desirous of obtaining a large number of men to work upon the projected railways that await construction in that country, authorized the firm of R. W. Cameron & Co., in this City, to provide for the shipment of men of the right sort, who were to be charged $40 each for their passage to Sydney. A large number of applicants appeared in answer to the advertisement for emigrants, from which number 99 were selected and assigned to berths on the bark N. Boynton, of 1,800 tons, commanded by Capt. Blanchard. The quarters assigned the passengers were between decks, aft of the main hatch, the berths being bunks roughly raised on either side, three tiers high. One corner of the deck was partitioned off for the women and children of the party. The vessel was announced to sail at 9 o'clock in the morning, at which time all the passengers were on board, but the departure was unavoidably delayed for six hours. A crowd of people gathered at the end of the pier along the bark's side, and many friends of the emigrants climbed over the side and mingled with the crowd on deck. The top of the house or after-cabin was thronged with men, women, and children until 2:45 o'clock, and there were men standing in the mizzen-rigging, and leaning over the bulwarks, conversing with their friends on shore.

The crowd at 2 o'clock numbered several hundred, and as the time for leaving drew near, and the crew had made all the necessary preparations for taking the vessel out, the talk between the crowd on the dock and their departing friends and acquaintances became more hurried and broken. At this time a hearty stout man on the Boynton, who wore a cap and a very jolly expression, began addressing the crowd in a funny, showman-like vein. He was interrupted by a temporary excitement attending the recovery of one of the emigrants from the river, into which he had fallen while trying to get on board the vessel. He resumed his talk, however, showing a silver half-dollar to witness that he was not "broke," and declaring that he would never be able to stand the regulation compelling him to get up at 7 o'clock in the morning. The Captain, just before 3 o'clock, ordered all the passengers below deck, when their names were called, as they produced their tickets. Two or three of the crew then started off to look for stowaways. A short search resulted in the discovery of one in the forecastle, under a bunk and behind a seaman's chest. The Captain directed that the locker abaft the wheel be opened, and a sailor having descended into this place, which had been locked, with a lantern, he found a second stowaway, who was brought on deck and put over the side without loss of time. A large number of rough-looking men were kept back by the Police, as there was an evident desire on the part of some of them to go to Australia without paying their passage-money. Just at 3 o'clock the bark began to move. The jolly fat man and the whole company of emigrants were again allowed to come on deck as the vessel was towed out into the stream. As she receded from the shore, the beaming face was as broad as ever, and he could still be heard with his jest. "What do we go for?" he was heard to ask. Drawing out his pocket-book and showing that it was empty, he shouted, "Going to fill it up." The American flag was run up, the vessel slowly moved away, and as her head came opposite the wharf where the party on board sent up a cheer that was answered by those on the dock, and these cheers were continued until the Boynton had reached mid-stream. The vessel was to go as far as Sandy Hook last night, and will probably get fairly under way for her destination, hoping to reach it in 90 days. The bark Sierra Nevada will soon follow the Boynton with a larger company of emigrants.

TILDEN'S CAMPAIGN OF CRIME.

UNBLUSHING ATTEMPTS TO BUY ELECTORS AND STATES TO VOTE FOR A MAN REJECTED BY THE PEOPLE—THE PLOT OF HIS AGENT FIELD TO FIX TILDEN'S CRIMES ON THE LOUISIANA BOARD—THE CROWNING OFFENSE OF FIELD'S COMMITTEE, WHO REFUSE GOV. WELLS A HEARING.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 4.—The committee of the House of which Mr. David Dudley Field is the leader has for several days past been trying to prove that ex-Gov. Wells, of the Louisiana Returning Board, desired to make money out of the position he occupied in the State named. To prove that such was the case two witnesses have been produced. One of them was Mr. Maddox, a disgraced adventurer, and the other Mr. Pickett, a claim agent, who at all times was ready to go into all sorts of disreputable speculations. These men have sworn that they thought they could buy the Louisiana Returning Board for $1,000,000, and that for that sum they hoped to secure the vote of the State named for Tilden and Hendricks. In support of their statement they have brought no proof, at least none which would be accepted in a court of law. As to their own testimony, it is valueless, for, according to the confession of Maddox, they hoped to profit largely by the crime which they wished Wells and his associates to commit. On the other hand, Gen. Anderson, of the Returning Board, has sworn positively that he never had 10 minutes' conversation with Maddox in his life; that he never had any intimation that he was authorized to buy the good offices of the Returning Board for Tilden, and that if he had been so authorized he would not have succeeded. Farther than this, Gen. Anderson has sworn that he was offered $200,000 to have the Electoral vote of Louisiana counted for Tilden, and that he refused the offer. The proposition was made to him by Dr. Robertson, a Democratic State Senator, and one of the best-known Tilden agents in the South. Regarding the story that Gov. Wells wrote to Senator West to have him raise money to secure the vote of Louisiana for Hayes, it can only be said that Gov. Wells never made any such proposition. He does not deny that he wrote the letter to West mentioned by the witness Maddox, but he does deny, in the most emphatic terms, that he intended it as a black-mailing document. His explanation of the paper is as follows: Some time before the counting of the Electoral vote of Louisiana, he was approached by a number of Democrats who intimated to him that he could make a fortune if he would secure the State for Tilden and Hendricks. Among those who so approached him was Duncan F. Kenner, one of the best-known Democrats in New-Orleans, who told him distinctly and in exact terms that if he would have the State counted for Tilden he would be paid $200,000. This offer Gov. Wells, who it may be well to state is a man of large property, refused in the most positive terms. After it was made, however, he became alarmed for the safety of the Republican cause and the triumph of justice in Louisiana, and he sent by Maddox to Senator West the letter produced yesterday, to warn the latter gentleman of the efforts which the Democrats were making to illegally capture the vote of the State. This was his only object. It will be noticed that Gov. Wells yesterday sent to Mr. Field's committee and asked in strong terms that he might be allowed to testify to these facts, and to contradict the lying story told by Maddox and Pickett. This privilege was denied him by a strict party vote, every party friend of "Tilden's man Friday" voting in the negative. They were afraid of the truth, and like good Democrats they used their power to suppress it. To-morrow or on Tuesday, however, they will be obliged to listen to some disagreeable testimony, for the Republicans are fully prepared to show that, having failed to buy either Gen. Anderson or Gov. Wells, Mr. Tilden's friends and agents in New-Orleans offered Mr. A. B. Lavisse, one of the Hayes Electors, $100,000 to cast his vote for "the great Reformer," and his soft-money partner, Mr. Hendricks. Perhaps the Democratic members of Mr. Field's commitee will be able to overthrow this testimony, but before doing so it would be well for them to dispose of the evidence of State Senator Beverly Nash, of South Carolina, who swears positively that Mr. Childs, Tilden's agent in South Carolina, offered him $50,000 to cast his vote as Elector for the candidates named. Poor old Mr. Field has made desperate efforts to injure the cause of Republicanism, justice, and law. But he has not succeeded. He is not so strong, either mentally or physically, as he was when he supported Cardozo, Tweed, and the New-York Ring.

A PETTIFOGGER IN CONGRESS.

TRICKS WORTHY OF THE COUNSEL OF THE ERIE SWINDLERS—GROSS VIOLATION OF THE PRIVILEGES OF THE HOUSE—ATTEMPT TO FOIST GARBLED TESTIMONY UPON THE ELECTORAL COMMISSION—PROCTOR KNOTT'S NAME IMPUDENTLY USED TO COVER FRAUD.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 4.—There has been a gross violation of the privileges of the House, and a violation of all the principles of honor and of common decency, which, so far as appears on the face of the affair, is traceable to David Dudley Field. A pamphlet has been privately printed containing 146 pages, which bears the following announcement on the title-page: "Testimony relating to Florida, taken before the Committee of the House of Representatives on the Powers, Privileges, and Duties of the House of Representatives in Counting the Electoral Vote, Hon. J. Proctor Knott, Chairman." The pamphlet is said to have been smuggled before the Electoral Commission, along with Fields' objections, and to be a part of the evidence which Hon. Charles O'Conor is trying to induce the Commission to consider. The testimony before the Fields committee, of which Knott used to be Chairman, has not been reported to the House, nor any part of it. No member of the committee has any rights in regard to the use of it which is not possessed by any private citizen, but some one has culled out of the mass of the testimony taken, such parts of it as relate to Florida and suit the Democratic case. For instance, there are included parts of the testimony of the telegraph operators without the cross-examinations; in all cases only those extracts are made which, uncontradicted or unexplained, are supposed to aid in some way the Democratic cause. There are parts of Secretary Chandler's testimony and the hearsay stories and bogus telegrams. The whole thing bears the impress of David Dudley Field, and it is stated that he is having a similar pamphlet prepared on the evidence in Louisiana. In the Florida document he has introduced a part of the evidence of Louis M. Kenner, of the Louisiana Returning Board, showing his occupation, and something about the Vernon Parish return. No such indecent abuse of the powers of a committee—not of its rights, for the committee has no such right over the evidence—has ever been attempted by any member of Congress. The Republican members of the committee appeared to be thoroughly scared and overawed by Field, but they ought to summon courage to have this business investigated, and bring it before the House, to find out whether the Democratic majority will sustain such a proceeding.

THE ELECTORAL COMMISSION.

TO-DAY'S ARGUMENTS—MR. EVARTS AND MR. O'CONOR TO CLOSE THE FLORIDA CASE — THE DECISION ANXIOUSLY LOOKED FOR—THE DEMOCRATS RATHER DESPONDENT.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 4.—The Electoral Commission will have three hours of arguments to-morrow on the question of admitting evidence in the case of Florida. The first hour and a half will be occupied by Mr. Evarts, and Mr. O'Conor is announced to close for the Democrats. Mr. Evarts' speech is expected to be the greatest event of the trial, as it is known that he has made careful preparation. The proceedings of the Commission are rather difficult to predict, as there are no very definite rules by which they are governed. It is supposed, however, that after the conclusion of the arguments they will enter upon the consideration of the question of receiving evidence, and will first decide and announce to the counsel the decision upon that point. This announcement will, it testimony is taken, open the case anew to a considerable extent, but it the Commission should decide not to receive evidence leading into an examination of the election of Electors, the case would be practically closed to arguments. The question of law may arise as to the powers of the Florida Returning Board, and may lead to a further hearing; and there may be a decision that evidence shall be received, if offered, as to the regularity and authenticity of the Governor's certificate. The Commission may decide all questions arising hereafter in this case, without further arguments. There continues to be a great deal of anxiety, of course, about the action of the Commission. The Democrats are privately very much depressed, and Jere Black and Mr. Beck are said to be very much discouraged and hopeless.

INDISPOSITION OF CONGRESS TO CONSIDER THE SUBJECT SERIOUSLY—ATTENTION FULLY OCCUPIED WITH THE PRESIDENTIAL QUESTION—MASTERLY INACTIVITY THE PREVAILING POLICY.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 4.—The President's Message on the subject of specie payments came to Congress in a rather unfortunate time to get any immediate and considerate attention. It was late Saturday afternoon, and the House was thin, the arguments before the Electoral Commission absorbing the attention of everybody in the capital. The substance of the Message was also known beforehand, and interest in the recommendations had been previously satisfied. The Message was read and referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, after a curious proposition from Mr. Bland, of Missouri, to refer it to the Silver Commission. The Message does not contain the suggestion expected, that provisions be made for immediate resumption. This modification of the intention of the President, which he was understood a few days ago to entertain, and which was manifested by an inquiry as to whether existing law would not permit him to direct the Secretary of the Treasury to take immediate measures for resumption was caused, no doubt, by the consideration that action by Congress, during this session, for such an object could not be hoped for. The change of law which he recommends would undoubtedly bring the country very speedily to specie payments by equalizing the value of gold and greenbacks. The proposition would be at once taken up by a strong party in the House except that the Presidential question overshadows everything, and prevents even the careful consideration of the Appropriation bills. The recommendations meet with opposition from the silver money people generally, because they intend to force the dollar of our fathers into circulation, whenever there is any legislation affecting resumption. The larger number of Congressmen who discuss the subject at all are indifferent as to present action, and say that they think it better on the whole to defer legislation till the natural operations of trade have had a further time to work out a result. They seem to expect that greenbacks will, in a few months, be as good as gold, and when that time comes there will be less difficulty in securing necessary legislation to maintain the condition. In short, it must be said that the disposition of Congress seems to be to assume a policy of masterly inactivity in dealing with the financial question.

THE APPROPRIATION BILLS.

PROSPECTS FOR THE PASSAGE OF ALL BEFORE MARCH 4—PRESENT PROGRESS OF THE LEADING BILLS—THE RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATION.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 4.—Mr. Holman, Chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, is confident that he will be able to have passed in good season, before March 4, all the general Appropriation bills. Of the 12 regular Appropriation bills only one—the Pension bill—has thus far been passed by both houses, and received the approval of the President. Of the others, the Fortification, Military Academy, and Consular and Diplomatic bills have passed both houses, and are awaiting adjustment by committees of conference. The differences between the two houses on these bills are not material, and will be readily adjusted. The Post Office and Indian bill have passed the House, and are now with the Senate Committee on Appropriations. The Legislative, Executive, and Judicial bills passed the House yesterday, and will be referred to the Senate committee early next week. The Deficiency bill is now before the House, and is the next appropriation bill to be considered by that body. The Army, Navy, and Sundry Civil bills are now being prepared by sub-committees of the House Committee on Appropriations, and will be reported to the House some time this week. The River and Harbor bill is being prepared by the House Committee on Commerce, and will be ready to report before the other bills are disposed of. Heretofore the River and Harbor bill has been a kind of "omnibus" for all sorts of jobs for Congressmen ambitious to maintain themselves in public life at the expense of the public Treasury, and more interest has been manifested in it than in any other of the regular appropriation bills. The action of the President, however, with reference to this appropriation last year, has acted like a decree of divorce, and backwoods statesmen are not now manifesting the same degree of interest in the improvement of mountain streams that they have hitherto manifested. There is no reason to suppose that any of the regular appropriations will fail for lack of time to pass them; but should any one of them so fail, it will be the River and Harbor bill. The Senate Committee on Appropriations will take up the bills now before them, and will report them to the Senate without unnecessary delay, and in ample time to permit them to be finally acted upon before March 4.

ALEXANDER H. STEPHENS.

AN UNFAVORABLE CHANGE LATE LAST NIGHT —GROWING WEAKER.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 4.—At a late hour to-night a change was announced in Mr. Stephens' condition, and the reports were not so encouraging as early in the evening. His mind is clear, but his voice is so weak that he can scarcely articulate. Among the callers on Mr. Stephens to-day were Judge Davis, of the Supreme Court, and Senators Bogy and Norwood, to whom he expressed the opinion that he was growing weaker.

THE MISSISSIPPI JETTIES.

OPERATION OF THE SYSTEM SHOWN IN THE RECENT FLOOD FROM THE OHIO RIVER.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 4.—Mr. Eads received a dispatch to-day from E. L. Corthell, resident engineer at the jetties, that the channel through the shoal at the head of South Pass is now 22 feet deep, and that the least width in which 20 feet depth is found is 110 feet. The principal works to improve this shoal were constructed during the last six months. The low stage and feeble current of the river has delayed their effect until the recent flood from the Ohio reached them, and the problem of deepening the shoal was fully solved by the rapid scouring away of the obstruction. The dispatch states that the channel is straight and deepening rapidly. The channel through the jetties at the mouth of the pass is 21 feet deep, with a least width of 200 feet, in which no depth less than 20 feet is found. The entrance from the sea through the jetties is 1,000 feet wide, and through the works at the head of the pass 800 feet.

NOTES FROM THE CAPITAL.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 4.—Yesterday a review and brigade drill of the troops stationed at the arsenal took place in the presence of the Secretary of War, the General of the Army and his staff. Upon the arrival of the officials at the grounds, the guard at the gate was paraded and the bugle sounded in honor of the General, while a salute of 15 guns from a field battery commanded by Capt. Randolph of the First Artillery, was fired for the Secretary of War. The party proceeded immediately to the parade grounds, where the brigade, under Gen. Barry, was drawn up in line. The brigade consisted of three battalions, the first composed of companies of the Artillery School; the second composed of five companies of the Second and Third Artillery, commanded by Capt. Frank B. Hamilton of the Second Artillery; the third composed of four companies of the First Artillery, under command of Capt. Frank E. Taylor, of the First Artillery.

Charles O'Conor, in company with Secretary Fish, called upon President Grant to-day.

The Ohio Senators and Representatives have received copies of the resolutions of the Cincinnati Chamber of Commerce, heartily approving of the bill appropriating $50,000 for the expedition to the North pole, on the plan suggested by Capt. Howgate.

A petition was lately presented to the Senate from persons representing themselves to be lineal descendants and heirs-at-law of Col. Weissenfels, of the Revolutionary Army, who was entitled to 2,000 acres of land under an order of Council and royal proclamation of October, 1763, but lost the land by his participation in the rebellion of the colonies. They represent that he rendered distinguished and valuable services, and that as he was never indemnified for his loss his heirs ought to receive the compensation to which he was entitled. The Committee on Revolutionary Claims report that the claim is so ancient that the facts in regard to Col. Weissenfels cannot be ascertained, nor proofs produced, but say if it clearly appeared that he had taken every step necessary to obtain the land, and it had been granted to him, and he had lost it by adhering to the colonies, still there is no law to compensate him or his heirs, and if it is done it will be a mere gratuity. The claims of Col. Weissenfels are not superior to those of many other patriotic men, who were willing to risk all they had in the service of their country, and who found their indemnity in the triumph of the cause.

Previous to the President's Message of yesterday, a number of members of Congress with whom he had conversed favored the funding of the 4 per cent. bonds. The subject will be considered by the Appropriation Committee of each house.

Mr. M. C. Hopper, Secretary of the National Revenue Reform Association of New-York, has delivered to Representative Willis his revision of the tariff and collection laws applied to the present Revenue Statutes of the United States, prepared under the auspices of the New-York Chamber of Commerce and the Importers' and Grocers' Board of Trade. It does not affect the rates of duties, but removes all doubts in order to avoid the constant litigation with the Government.

A number of bankers will be heard by the Committee of Ways and Means on Wednesday.

The Morrison Louisiana Investigating Committee have finished their examination of witnesses, and will, it is expected, make their report to the House to-morrow. Gen. Hurlbut will present a minority report on the part of the Republican members of this committee. Senator Howe's committee will also make their report to the Senate to-morrow relative to the Louisiana election.

A number of persons, directly and indirectly connected with the Louisiana Returning Board, have arrived here, among them Messrs. McCormack, Davis, and Eaton, who were summoned at the request of the Republican members of this committee, and by whom they expect to break down the testimony of Littlefield. The Democrats rely on Mr. Abell, the Chief Clerk of the Returning Board, and others, to sustain Littlefield.

A man named Bennett, connected with a silver-plating establishment here, came to a sudden death to-day from the effects of drinking acid used in such business, mistaking it for water.

THE ASHTABULA BRIDGE.

CLEVELAND, Feb. 4.—The Coroner's jury at Ashtabula yesterday examined George H. Carpenter, who testified that at the time the bridge was built he was employed in the Lake Shore Railroad shops at Cleveland, but afterward had charge of the raising of the bridge with Mr. Rogers under his direction; when the braces were sent from the shops to the bridge they had no marks on them to show where they belonged; after the bridge was erected, Mr. Stone expressed himself well satisfied with the work, and said it had been well done; he does not consider the system of lateral bracing in this bridge good for anything.

THREE CHILDREN DROWNED.

BOSTON, Feb. 4.—Minnie and Annie Striley and Nellie Voorhuse, aged five, eight, and ten years, were drowned at Salem on Saturday evening by breaking through the ice at the foot of Osgood street.

THE ICE IN THE SUSQUEHANNA.

COLUMBIA, Feb. 4.—The fears of an ice-gorge in the Susquehanna River at this point are rapidly disappearing, and from present appearances the ice will pass away with little or no damage.

THE EASTERN COMPLICATIONS.

CIRCULAR OF PRINCE GORTSCHAKOFF TO RUSSIAN REPRESENTATIVES ABROAD INSTRUCTING THEM TO ASCERTAIN THE COURSE THE POWERS MEAN TO PURSUE TOWARD TURKEY—TURKISH NEGOTIATIONS WITH SERVIA.

ST. PETERSBURG, Feb. 4.—Prince Gortschakoff's circular note, which is addressed to the Russian representatives at the Courts of the other guaranteeing powers, is published in the Official Gazette to-day. The note first calls to mind the fact that through Russia's initiative an understanding between the great powers was brought about at the beginning of the Eastern crisis. This agreement was disturbed by the rejection of the Berlin Memorandum, but was shortly afterward restored on the basis proposed by England. The powers at the conference unanimously submitted their demands to the Porte, which declined them. Prince Gortschakoff considers that Europe by its united diplomatic action has proved that it is deeply interested in the maintenance of peace in the East, and that it recognizes it to be its duty as well as its right to co-operate for that end on behalf of the general interest. The Russian Government, being guided by the desire to maintain European accord in the new phase of the Eastern question, has, before coming to any decision in the matter, instructed its representatives to ascertain for certain what course the Governments to which they are accredited mean to pursue in view of the refusal of the Porte to accede to their unanimous wishes.

LONDON, Feb. 5.—A special dispatch from Frankfort says the treaty between Roumania and Russia is on the point of coming into operation. The Russian army received orders on Saturday to be prepared to cross the Pruth if the Porte concentrates troops on the Dalmatian frontier.

A telegram from Bucharest says another Turkish band has invaded Roumanian territory and been repulsed by the frontier guard. One of the Turks killed two prisoners.

The Times' dispatch from Belgrade, Sunday, says reports that the peace negotiations between the Servian Agent and the Turkish Ambassador at Vienna have been broken off in consequence of the Porte's persistence in demanding guarantees the nature of which it refused to specify. The Times correspondent says it is quite probable that the Turkish proposals to Servia and Montenegro were more the result of a desire to appear magnanimous in the eyes of Europe than of anxiety for peace, as the Porte undoubtedly believes that in the event of a Russo-Turkish war, Russia will make use of Servia in spite of any treaty which may have been concluded between Servia and Turkey. It peace is not made with Servia before March 1, the Turks intend to march in converging columns on Kragujevatz, the former capital, and call together a Servian Assembly there which shall overturn the present Government and make a satisfactory treaty with the Porte. Should this be accomplished, and Prince Karageorgevich be placed on the Servian throne, Austria would undoubtedly favor the movement strongly. A good many Servians also would not oppose such a change very strenuously.

A Times dispatch from Vienna, of the same date as the foregoing, says the Porte, although it has not yet informed Servia of the nature of the guarantees it demands, has confidentially communicated them to the powers, and the latter have expressed an unfavorable opinion of them. All the powers, however, seem most anxious not to quit their present attitude of reserve, or offer one-sided advice. So, if it is possible that the Porte made the communication to elicit some suggestion from the powers, the attempt has failed.

The Times says: "Russia having apparently determined to weaken Turkey by prolonged armaments, it is expected that a new and menacing diplomatic campaign will be undertaken. As to the rumor that Russia is on the point of bridging the Pruth, the Times is of the opinion that operations in that quarter will be almost impossible until Summer.

The Times' Berlin correspondent sketches the guarantees required of Servia by Turkey. He says that Turkey will not restore to Servia all her fortresses while the Russians remain on the Pruth. The Porte seems to regard a resumption of the Servian war advantageous to Turkey, as it may force Russia to take the field before Turkey is exhausted by delay.

The Vienna correspondent of the Times points significantly to Gen. Ignatieff's returning home by way of Vienna, coupled with the remarkable attitude of the German semi-official press, which has lately been urging Austria to come to an understanding with Russia. The Allegemeine Zeitung says this understanding should not only extend to what is not to be done, but to what is to be. The allied Emperors must prepare resolutions to show that the three mighty sovereigns have not joined hands only for theoretical speculations and festive meetings.

The Times in its leading editorial, says: "Prince Gortschakoff's circular will not, we fear, tend to lessen the distrust with which Russia is viewed in England. It will be regarded as an invitation to begin war from which, if Turkey had no allies, Russia would certainly profit. The English Government will certainly reply, with the approval of Parliament, that England will hold herself free to guard her own interests and the general interests of peace. England will await events. If Russia is more precipitate, she must act on her own responsibility."

The dispatch from Belgrade also says that on Saturday 400 men left Belgrade for Gladova. From 4,000 to 6,000 volunteers, mostly foreigners, are stationed opposite Turnseverin, and will proceed to Gladova as soon as they receive supplies of new clothing. This concentration of troops at Gladova strongly indicates prospective co-operation with foreign forces, as the troops can be of no possible use at Gladova except to hold the crossing of the Danube between Roumania and Servia.

FRENCH AND GERMAN POLITICS.

PARIS, Feb. 4.—The Gaulois asserts that the Count of Chambord is staying at Versailles incognito.

LONDON, Feb. 5.—Reuter's Paris dispatch reports that the Republican press is greatly excited because the Court of Cassation has given a decision affirming the judgment of a Besançon court in a libel suit which has an important political bearing. The suit was brought by a former member of one of the Mixed Commissions which were established after the coup d'état, and the decision involves a declaration that those tribunals were legal.

BERLIN, Feb. 4.—The reports of the organization of the Landstrum are denied in official circles here.

The North German Gazette reverts to the anti-German articles in the Revue des Deux Mondes, and says: "These expressions are significant in France, because the renewal of war against Germany is considered by every one only a question of time, and constitutes a permanent factor in all political calculations."

MISCELLANEOUS FOREIGN NOTES.

RESIGNATION OF THE COMMANDER OF THE PAPAL ARMY—DEATH OF AN ENGLISH PATRON OF THE TURF.

LONDON, Feb. 5.—The Standard's dispatch from Rome says Gen. Kanzler, the nominal Minister of War, and commander of the Papal Army, has resigned in consequence of differences with Monsignor Timeoni, the new Cardinal Secretary of State.

Mr. Merry, the owner of Doncaster Thormanby, and other famous horses, is dead.

THE EXPLOITS OF "TORPEDO BEY."

THE DISTINGUISHED GUEST OF GEN. NEWTON AT THE HELL GATE EXPLOSION—A BOGUS DRAFT PALMED OFF ON A BANKING FIRM—THE WHEREABOUTS OF THE ENTERPRISING "TURK" UNKOWN.

The exposure of the swindling operations of Col. H. B. Edinboro', alias "Torpedo Bey," published in THE TIMES of yesterday, has excited much attention in the fashionable circles of which that distinguished "Turk" was until recently a shining ornament. Fresh victims of this man of many nationalities are turning up daily. Gen. John Newton invited him to the Hell Gate explosion of last Autumn, at which the "Bey" figured as one of the most noted guests. Capt. Doty, of Washington, D. C., the author of the improved light-house system now being introduced in Europe, was one of the first to fall a victim to his winning ways. The noble "Turk" mapped out a magnificent scheme—something after the pattern of Col. Sellers' eye-water—by which the light-houses could be introduced at an immense profit in Turkey, China, and Japan; in fact, throughout the entire East, and solemnly pledged Col. Doty that as soon as he could communicate with his friends at the various Oriental courts, the plan would be carried out at once. Hon. Charles D. Poston, now stopping at the New-York Hotel, says that he was first introduced to "Edinboro' Bey" several years ago, at a private dinner party in London. The latter was then figuring as an agent of the Chinese Government, on an important mission to England. He was an intimate friend of Gen. R. S. Ripley, and also of the Chinese Customs agent in London. In this City, "Col. Edinboro'" was introduced into the Travelers' Club, and to many well-known men, into whose bank accounts he managed to make considerable inroads. On the occasion of the explosion at Hell Gate he represented himself as having come all the way from Turkey, partly to witness this explosion, and talked learnedly of the effect of a dynamite battery in the Dardanelles and the Bosphorus for the purpose of annihilating the fleets of Russia and other powers hostile to his royal master, the Sultan. The "Bey's" views on this and other phases of the Eastern question were published at the time in several City papers. One of his performances consisted of negotiating a bogus draft on Brown Bros. & Co. for £175 sterling, on which he obtained $600 in gold. When the draft reached Brown Bros. it was found that there were no funds to meet it. Scores of other episodes in which this dashing gentleman figured to equal disadvantage could be told. The proprietor of the St. Omer Hotel has signed an affidavit at the request of Mr. Cranston, of the New-York Hotel, stating the facts connected with the three $1,000 gold certificates mentioned in THE TIMES of yesterday. No trustworthy information has yet been obtained regarding the "Bey's" present whereabouts. It was rumored yesterday that he had gone South, and several gentlemen whom he has victimized have announced their intention of following him to New-Orleans and inflicting personal chastisement on him.

LOSSES BY FIRE.

MARVIN'S SAFE WAREHOUSE BURNED—THREE FIREMEN AND SEVERAL OTHER PERSONS INJURED—THE LOSS ESTIMATED AT $30,000.

At 9:50 o'clock last night John Loet, the janitor of the building No. 265 Broadway, the first floor of which is occupied by the Marvin Safe Company, and the upper floors as law offices, while going through the premises was attracted by the smell of smoke coming from the lower portion of the building. On investigation he discovered a fire burning in the workshop of the Safe Company, which is situated in the rear of the basement. He ran into the street crying, "fire!" His cries brought an officer of the Fourth Precinct to the spot, and an alarm was immediately sent out. Several steamers and trucks arrived promptly, and when the doors were bust open it was found that the entire basement was enveloped in flames. The smoke was so dense that the firemen were unable to enter the cellar, and as the streams of water could not reach the body of the fire, which was in the rear, the flames made rapid headway and soon extended to the first floor, which is used as an office and sales-room. Fearing a disastrous conflagration, the officer in command of the firemen sent out a second alarm, which brought to the scene of the conflagration a reinforcement. The flames, however, despite the efforts of the firemen, burned fiercely, and as the beams supporting the floor were burned through, the flooring gave way under the great weight of safes stored there, and almost the entire stock of safes, about 50 in number, fell through to the cellar with a loud crash. The meter through which the gas for the entire building is supplied was situated underneath the front window, and when the flames reached that spot the leaden gas pipe melted. The escaping gas exploded with a loud report, completely demolishing the large plate-glass windows, and covering the sidewalks with debris. A number of firemen who were in the building, and several of the bystanders, were injured by the fragments. James Brady, John Driscoll, and James Campbell, members of Engine Company No. 7, were thrown down by the explosion and severely injured. They were removed to the Chambers Street Hospital, where their wounds were dressed. The other persons injured only received slight wounds. The fire was confined to the basement and first floor, and by midnight was entirely under control. The loss of the Marvin Safe Company is estimated at $25,000 on stock and fixtures; insured for $10,000. The building is damaged to the amount of $5,000. The occupants of the offices on the upper floors did not sustain any material damage. It was impossible to ascertain the cause of the fire.

A RAILROAD PAINT SHOP DESTROYED—LOSS, $200,000.

A disastrous fire occurred in Trenton, N. J., last evening. A short distance north of the Pennsylvania Railroad Depot stood a long building known to railroad employes as the Trenton Paint Shop. It was used mainly as a cover for engines and other rolling stock. At about five o'clock last evening flames were discovered issuing from one of the windows. An alarm was at once sounded, and the Fire Department responded promptly. The flames burned with such rapidity that it was found impossible to get out any of the rolling stock in the building, and notwithstanding the efforts of the firemen the structure was entirely consumed. There were eight locomotives and two or three cars in the shop. They were burned so as to be almost valueless. The loss, it is estimated, will reach $200,000, and it may prove to be larger. The cause of the fire is not known. Various theories are advanced in explanation, and it is suspected in some quarters that it was the work of an incendiary.

SUPPOSED INCENDIARISM IN CATHARINE STREET.

Shortly before 6 o'clock last evening a fire broke out in the clothing store of Isadore Cohen, on the first floor of the building, No. 94 Catharine street. The flames also extended to the second and third floors of the building which were occupied as a dwelling by Mr. Cohen, and before the flames could be extinguished a loss of $10,000 had been caused, which is, however, fully covered by insurance. The fire had a very suspicious appearance and Capt. Murray, of the Fourth Precinct, on making an investigation, learned that Mr. Cohen and his entire family were absent when the fire broke out. Patrick H. Welsh, of No. 67 Catharine street, informed the Captain that Chellaw Jenkins, of No. 83 Madison street, a clerk employed in the store, was seen to leave the premises a few minutes before the fire was discovered, and that he walked rapidly away with his hat drawn over his eyes as though he wished to avoid recognition. Jenkins was soon after arrested, and on being questioned said that he had not been in the store since noon. He was, however, detained for examination. Fire Marshal Sheldon has been notified, and will thoroughly investigate the matter.

OTHER FIRES.

At 4 o'clock yesterday morning a fire occurred in the basement of Vosburg's shoe store, in the Ruchman House, at Little Falls, N. Y., and the hotel, with its contents, was destroyed. The occupants of the house escaped with great difficulty, and with scant apparel. The building was owned by the Hinchman heirs, was valued at $30,000, and insured for $10,000. Bridenstein & Co., the hotel proprietors, lose about $11,000, which is covered by an insurance of $3,500. C. E. Vosburg's total loss is unknown, but is covered by an insurance of $3,000. Antone Oppeel, a jeweler; W. & C. Nelson, Mrs. Wilkins, a milliner; W. J. Groom, a tea-dealer, each suffered to a slight extent by damage from smoke and water. The fire is supposed to have been of accidental origin. Mr. Vosburg was nearly dead from suffocation when rescued.

A fire broke out yesterday afternoon in a building used for housing locomotive engines, on the main track of the Pennsylvania Railroad, at Trenton, N. J. The fire is supposed to have been communicated to the roof from sparks from one of the locomotives. There were eight first-class locomotives in the building at the time, all of which were more or less injured. The damage is estimated at from $50,000 to $100,000.

The loss by the burning of the Valley Falls Cotton Mill at Rockville on Saturday is estimated at $8,000, and is covered by an insurance of $3,000.

TRYING TO SECURE THE OFFICES.

THE EFFORTS OF NEW-JERSEY DEMOCRATS —THEY WANT THE NEWARK AND JERSEY CITY LOCAL OFFICES—CANDIDATES FOR THE STATE CONTROLLERSHIP—THE MORRISTOWN INSANE ASYLUM.

From Our Own Correspondent.

TRENTON, Sunday, Feb. 4, 1877.

The State Senate will be asked to-morrow evening to concur in the resolution passed by the House last week, designating Friday, March 2, as the day for the final adjournment of the Legislature. It is not likely that the session will be prolonged beyond the day mentioned in the resolution; but it is hardly probable that the Senate will consent immediately to the adoption of the resolution. A speedy adjournment is regarded by the Democrats as but a device on the part of the Republicans to cut off a joint meeting at which a State office and some local offices are to be filled. The Republicans, as a body, have as yet taken no steps either for or against joint meeting. An effort is being made by the Democrats to hold the meeting this week, and it is probable that both parties will take the subject into caucus to-morrow or Tuesday night.

Meanwhile the thousand and one Democrats who are seeking the 10 offices within the gift of the houses, go on with their wire-pulling as vigorously as though the question of joint meeting had been definitely settled. The main struggle is for the position of State Controller, which is now held by A. S. Runyon. There are no less than 20 Democrats in the field for the place. But the struggle is practically narrowed down between three or four of them. McMichael, of Burlington, seems to be in the lead, though the State-house Ring, notwithstanding their signal defeat in the Senatorial fight, have entered the lists against him. The Burlington candidate rendered good service to Senator McPherson in his triumph of two weeks ago, and it is likely that the Senator will reciprocate in the proper way. Robert Stockton, a brother of ex-Senator Stockton, is McMichael's most formidable competitor. The other offices to be filled in joint meeting are local offices, and the war, as to them, is confined to the delegates representing the counties in which the offices are located.

Besides the appointment for Clerk of the Supreme Court, the Governor will, with the concurrence of the Senate, fill several vacancies on the benches of the County Courts, and appoint several District Attorneys. The Senate has so long been controlled by the Republicans that most of the lay Judges of the several Courts of Common Pleas are now occupied by Republicans. Gov. Bedle has concluded, it is understood, to name for the vacancies none but Democrats. He sent to the Senate on Wednesday last the names of four candidates for the county benches, all of whom are said to be Democrats. Among the District Attorneys whose terms are about expiring is Col. Abeel, the Prosecutor of the Pleas of Essex County. He has proved himself an able advocate; but the fact of his being a Republican may prevent his reappointment. His position is one of the most responsible of its class in the State. He is himself very sanguine of reappointment.

Among the bills on the Speaker's calendar for to-morrow evening is that of Drohan's, for the turning over by the Republicans to the Democrats of the local government of Jersey City. All hope of its passage has been abandoned, and it is not unlikely that it will be withdrawn. Drohan, who is, in his efforts to oust the Republicans, making a large bid for the next Democratic nomination for Mayor, contemplates the introduction of another bill, transferring the functions of the present Board of Works, to the Board of Finance, of which he is President. All of his schemes are designed for his own personal advancement, and all consequently, look to the making of the Finance Board, the most important of the local boards. His bills have not met with any favor even among his Democratic confrères from Hudson County. A bill will probably be introduced into the Senate this week leaving the machinery of local government as it is, with the exception that the Commissioners of the several boards, who are now selected by the Legislature in joint meeting, shall hereafter be elected by the people. Such a bill, giving the Republicans an equal chance with the Democrats in the race for office, would probably find some favor with the Republican members, many of whom are heartily disgusted with the system of legislative commissions.

Of a piece with the efforts to secure the control of Jersey City, but more cheeky because Newark is a Republican city, is the effort of the Newark Democrats to gain possession of the Newark Fire and Police Departments. In that place election of Commissioners by the people would not please the Democratic heart, and a bill has been proposed empowering the Governor to appoint the boards for the control of the two departments. The Common Council, at their meeting held Friday evening, denounced the bill, and there is no chance of its passage.

It is stated that the Morristown Insane Asylum Commissioners intend to apply to the Legislature for another appropriation of $100,000. The money is needed, it is said, to cover an existing deficiency, to complete the main portion of the building as originally intended, to erect additional outbuildings, and to improve the grounds. The Legislature two years ago, when they made an appropriation for the building, did it upon the express understanding that no more should be asked. The Commissioners, however, asked last year for an additional appropriation, and upon the assurance that it would be the last outlay needed to complete the work according to the original design, it was granted.

THE ELEVENTH WARD BANK, OF BOSTON.

BOSTON, Feb. 4.—The Journal says: "Mrs. Drew, wife of the late President of the Eleventh Ward National Bank, has paid in a large sum from her personal estate toward canceling her husband's indebtedness to the bank. Its resources are now ample to meet all calls of the depositors, and the business of the bank will be continued."

TRAIN-WRECKERS AT WORK.

BALTIMORE, Feb. 4.—An attempt was made last night to wreck a train on the Western Maryland Railroad near Canetown, Washington County. The engine, tender, and baggage car were thrown from the track. No person was injured

A FALSE WIFE MURDERED.

STABBED BY AN ANGRY HUSBAND

SHE ESCAPES FROM HER ROOM TO BE STRUCK DOWN ON THE SIDEWALK IN CROSBY STREET—THE UNHAPPY CIRCUMSTANCES LEADING TO THE TRAGEDY—ESCAPE OF THE MURDERER.

Between 6:30 and 7 o'clock yesterday morning as Patrolman Conway, of the Fourteenth Precinct, was standing at the corner of Crosby and Howard streets, he was accosted by an excited Italian, who gave him to understand that a woman had been murdered in front of the tenement-house, No. 52 Crosby street. The policeman hastened to the house indicated by his informant, and on the threshold of the front hall door he found the body of a woman, in a semi-nude condition, lying in a pool of blood. What little clothing the woman had on was saturated with blood which had flowed from a ghastly stab wound in the right breast. When the officer arrived the woman was in a dying condition, and before he could procure assistance to remove her to the station-house she expired. A stretcher was sent for and carried by four policemen. The body was taken to the Mulberry Street Police Station. There the remains were identified as those of Mrs. Mary Flood, who had formerly lived at No. 52 Crosby street. Capt. Allaire and Detective Wade immediately repaired to the house, and learned that Mrs. Flood had been murdered by her husband, who had escaped, and sufficient evidence was obtained to indicate that the murder

FLORIDA HUNTING NOTES.

EXCELLENT SPORT IN THE INDIAN RIVER COUNTRY.

IMMENSE NUMBERS OF DUCKS, QUAIL, AND OTHER GAME—A VISIT TO THE SCOBIE MANSION—THE EFFECT OF BANJO MUSIC—"CRACKER" HUNTERS AND CUR DOGS—A BOSTONIAN WHO LIKED THE COUNTRY BUT COULD NOT STAND SOLITUDE.

An occasional correspondent writes us from "In camp at the head of Indian River, Florida," under date of Jan. 23, as follows:

The meteorological conditions for which we had been waiting came at last on Thursday morning, the 4th inst. A gentle breeze was blowing from the northwest at sunrise, and the sky gave every indication of steady clear weather. Even old Uncle Sam, whose prognostications are generally calculated to drive a picnic party crazy, said: "Gwine to be fine, boss," and pottered ostentatiously down to the boat with such small articles of camp equipage as he could lay his venerable hands on, in the expectation of being rewarded with a glass of "No'the'n sperrits" or a 25 cent shinplaster. An early breakfast dispatched, we soon, with Sam's assistance, had the Skylark loaded as full as she would hold of boxes and bags and guns and fishing-tackle, and all the other requisites of a long camping trip. Our party consisted of three—a New-Yorker besides myself, and McLean, a canny Scot, who resides near the Inlet, and who came along to enjoy the sport pending the arrival of his customers from the North, two Philadelphia men, who are expected on the 1st proximo. * * *

About 1 o'clock we reached Bissett's Grove, a high mound covered with wild orange trees, oak, palmetto, and vines, on the main shore, near the entrance to the lagoon. We beached the boat on the oyster shells, and C. and I took our guns, and, climbing the mound, made our way toward a fresh-water creek that runs in behind it. A swarm of ducks sat on its glistening water, while in the marsh beyond stood a large gannet and twenty or more white and blue herons of great stature, nearly all of which, we could see, had plumes. These plumes begin to grow on their backs about this season of the year, falling off in the Fall. They are very beautiful, and as they sell at good prices, numbers of birds are slaughtered annually for the plumes alone. We hesitated a full minute what to do, but at length concluded to pick out the gannet and the largest snowy heron for our first shot, and give the ducks the remaining barrel as they rose. Accordingly we crept slowly down through the thicket until we had almost attained the water's edge, and took aim from behind a tangle of vines and bushes that hid us completely from our unsuspecting victims. At a low signal two reports rang out, and then two more as ducks and herons rose screaming into the air. At the same instant a startled buck sprang from the bushes not 10 feet to the left of us, and dashed splashing through the creek and out of sight into the scrub beyond before we could reload. Five minutes' wading gave us four ducks, the gannet, and the heron, which latter we had to shoot again, and thus laden we reclimbed the ridge and did justice to the tempting meal that Mac's culinary skill had meanwhile provided for us. By sunset, as we pushed swiftly down the lagoon, our view no longer obstructed by islands. Afar off we saw a great white pelican that sat gravely on the water, slowly turning his head from side on the lookout for a finny meal. The white pelican is a rare bird, and, it is said, is only found in these waters. This one had his back to us, and consequently allowed us to approach quite near before showing signs of alarm. For fully 10 minutes we had been stretched forward, finger on trigger, watching him. As he rose a rifle bullet and 18 buckshot sped in his direction. He tumbled like a log, splashing the water to the height of several feet. We shot onward and a number of others in a row, toward the shore oceanward, looking like lumps of chalk against the green background, but they were too far off for even rifle practice.

It was nearly 5 o'clock when we ran in alongside of the remains of Swift's wharf, a log pier fully a quarter of a mile long, at the end of which live-oak was formerly cut for the use of the Navy. It has gone sadly to decay, and in places a board thrown loosely across the rents that time has made alone renders it passable. At the land end of the pier we were welcomed by Bill Scobie, a seven-foot darkey, black as the ace of spades, whose energy and thrift have placed him on a par with his white neighbors, so far as possessions and standing are concerned. Bill's master in ante-war times was a Massachusetts man named Scobie, who resided in Boston and hired Bill's services out to the planters in this region at so much per year and his keep. We unloaded our traps, and Bill, the lashings of Bill and his older boys, soon had our mast unshipped and the Skylark snugly drawn up under the ample boat-shed. Bill's house is a very substantial one of thick, unpainted pitch-pine logs. It has the usual central passage-way, on the right of which is a long unfurnished room, into which we were ushered. Mrs. Scobie overhauled our provisions, and soon had a tempting hot supper laid for us on a table which she took care to cover with a snowy cloth. It taxed the resources of the establishment to supply us with chairs, but a little hunting developed an old camp-stool, which was given to the man with the longest back. Supper over and the cloth removed, Mrs. Scobie placed a dish of tempting oranges on the table, and left us to our pipes. C. then uncovered his banjo, and began strumming a tune. There was a sound of pattering feet in the hallway, and presently the Scobie family began to slide into the room, until eight children, ranging from a toddling mite of 3 to a girl of 20 years, stood bashfully in a row, in the shadow along the further wall. As the music grew faster the 16 feet began to shuffle, and in a very few minutes the entire lot, baby and all, were dancing away like mad. The little thing could hardly do more than sway from foot to foot, and from time to time half round, but it stood out in the middle of the floor and kept time with the rest of them. And how they did enjoy it! They laughed, and chuckled, and pegged away as though they would never tire. C. brushed up his musical memory, and rattled off plantation tune after tune, and the faster he played, the faster they danced, until, finally, at 10 o'clock, his fingers gave out exhausted, while their feet were still hard at work. The scene was a highly amusing one.

While at breakfast the next morning, two woodducks flew up and alighted in a tree above our heads, and a flock of paroquets sailed past us screaming, from the cypress swamp in which they had been roosting all night. We let them go. Not so, however, four pintails that came along after we had finished. A double volley laid two of them low. About 9 o'clock the clouds dispersed and the sun came out. At the same time some turkeys began to think across from the pond in a hammock which lay some distance beyond. Mac and I dropped our books and went for them. We got around the pond, startling an alligator and numerous coots, and, creeping up to the edge of the hammock, imitated the call of the hen turkey. For a long time we were unrewarded, but at length the head of an old gobbler appeared above a clump of saw palmettoes about 40 yards off, and I let fly. Almost at the same instant Mac banged away at a pair of red legs he saw beneath another bush. As we ran up we saw one of the birds fluttering along badly wounded. We gave chase, and, after an exciting race, captured it. We could find no trace of the other, and retracing our steps we soon had our fill of quail shooting, a covey rising at every dozen steps all the way to camp. From where one flock got up Mac fired his second barrel into a black snake that measured at least 10 feet, breaking its back. After dinner we dispatched Myiass to Bissett's home, the nearest Post Office station, for our mail and an additional supply of coffee, which was running short, and again broke up into two parties—C. and Mac quail shooting near camp, and Conner and I, armed with rifles, going after deer. We went northward about a mile and a half until we found ourselves in a narrow strip of pine woods, edged on one side by a palmetto hammock and on the other by a "bay" of young cedars. Fresh tracks being very numerous here, Conner placed me behind a giant pine, with instructions to watch the "bay" closely, and proceeded himself further on. His theory was that, it being near sundown and just before the rising of the moon, a combination of favorable circumstances—the deer would come out of the bay to feed. It seems that they sleep all day in some convenient thicket, or in the largest clump of bushes they can find, and feed and travel by night, their most times being very irregular according to the vagaries of the moon. They are credited with eating only half an hour at a time, but my observation is that they make an all-night job of it. I had waited patiently for some time, and was just lighting a pipe to drive off the mosquitoes, when I heard a slight rustling in the bushes, and peering that way was almost thrown into a fit by the sight of two deer—a large doe, and a half-grown buck—walking unconcernedly toward me, and stopping every now and then to nibble the grass. Trembling with eagerness I lifted my rifle softly, and steadying it against the pine, took deliberate aim at the doe. I was so nervous, however, that every time I attempted to pull the trigger the fear of missing became overpowering, and I stopped. At length the doe was directly broadside to me. It was now or never. Bracing myself as rigidly as possible I cast my eyes once more along the barrel and fired. The doe threw up her head, dropped her tail, and, leaping high into the air, crashed into the bushes toward the hammock at lightning speed. As the same moment another report rang out, and the yearling, which had commenced retreating in another direction, dropped in its tracks. The second shot was fired by Conner, who had crept up stealthily behind me and had witnessed the entire performance. I began congratulating my luck, when as Conner expressed surprise and congratulated me on the accuracy of my aim. Sure enough, on going to look we readily found the doe gasping on the ground. She had a bullet-hole through and through her breast, and had run only about 20 yards. The yearling was stone dead, having been shot through the brain.

The entire party sat out together in a northerly direction, and after walking three miles separated, Mac and C. crossing a bay of cedars, and Conner and I continuing on the side we were on. Presently we came to a high, thick scrub of stunted oaks, and, directing me to station myself near a blasted pine which commanded the scrub on all sides, Conner plunged in with a view to rousting out a deer. He was not successful, however, although the fresh tracks in all directions indicated that the place had swarmed with deer on the previous night. We proceeded a mile and a half further through all kinds of scrub, beating it carefully. The signs seemed to become more abundant at every step, yet, singular to say, we could jump nothing. Conner was puzzled. Concluding that it was possibly too cool in the open, we plunged into the swamp on our right. There was so much water, and the trees and vines grew so thickly, that walking was very difficult until, after working our way for a quarter of a mile, we struck an abandoned road. Here the water was not so deep, though about as equally distributed, and there was less vegetation. We trudged mile after mile amid a stillness so profound as to draw from Conner many exclamations of astonishment and disgust. Wild orange trees were abundant, and pumpkins littered the ground at intervals. Finally, when a large woodpecker flew chattering across the path Conner saw me shoot it without a sign of disapproval, and a little further on he even called my attention to two squirrels, one chasing a tree and the other running along a log, and appeared delighted when I bagged both. Once only did he stop excitedly and hold out his hand. There was a tremendous splashing in the water on our right. Conner's eyes blazed as he unslung his rifle and muttered: "A bear, by gracious!" A moment later the bellowing of a bull resounded over the swamp. Conner shouldered his gun again, we both smiled and passed on.

Two mornings later we struck camp, and returned to the creek at the head of the river. We found nearly 1 foot more water on the road than when we passed over it previously. Not one palmetto tree we saw the recent scratches made by the claws of a bear which had climbed after the ripe berries, and there were numerous turkey signs in every dry spot. We loaded the canoe, and sent Mac on with it. Conner was lying asleep on the site of our first camp, C. and I were seated at the edge of the hammock reading, and Myiass, Conner's man, had gone back with the cart for some of our traps, when suddenly we were startled by a furious splashing in the water of a brook mentioned in a former letter. Looking up, we saw one of the most beautiful sights I ever witnessed. Five bucks were plunging through the brook at the top of their speed, having evidently been frightened at something. They bounded along until they winded Conner, when the entire five stopped abreast, their graceful bodies curved, their necks arched, and their ears and noses thrust forward in the attitude of intense listening. A rifle bullet sped from where we sat would probably have passed through the five bodies, but, of course, our arms were out of reach. They stood a moment only, then, turning, they dashed swiftly into the thicket and disappeared. When Myiass returned he reported having seen two does in the prairie. Mac soon got back and we embarked and were paddled down to the old landing place on the prairie opposite Conner's. On the way I killed a great blue heron that flew broadside to the boat in an unusually tempting manner, and two snowy herons, both of which had plumes. * * * Soon after this I tumbled plump into an alligator hole, which, fortunately, was not very deep. These holes are dug in the edges of ponds and are neatly thatched over, though for what purpose I cannot imagine; it certainly cannot be to keep out the wet. The further South you go the larger the holes become, and the larger the 'gators.

We struck through the hammock at random, and by dint of much shouting found the tent pitched on the highest point of a high, dry mound, amid tall palmettoes. It was the perfection of a camping spot. The mosquitoes were very thick outside the radius of the fire, and after supper we put up our mosquito bars for the first time this Winter. We were much amused, while lounging before the fire smoking, by the antics of several little chameleons, which darted hither and thither with lightning rapidity, catching one of the pests at every leap. One of Conner's dogs afforded us some excitement by chasing a wild-cat through the camp. We snatched our rifles and scampered after the varmint, but the night was too dark and our aim too tender to tempt the palmetto roots and fallen logs very far. Just before bed-time there was a mysterious crashing in the bushes behind the tent. We gathered a quantity of dried palmetto fans and threw them upon the fire, making a blaze many feet in height, and by the aid of its light explored the woods in all directions, without discovering the cause of the disturbance. The scene at this time was of unexampled beauty, the bright glare penetrating the darkness for several hundred yards in a circle and enveloping the tropical vegetation in a halo of romantic glory.

It is a singular fact that the climate of Florida, while exercising a beneficial effect upon the human lungs, has a directly contrary tendency where dogs are concerned. Very few dogs in this country live to any age without becoming afflicted with a bad cough. There are, on the other hand, two instances on record in Smyrna—one of a negress and the other of a white man, both of whom contracted the fell disease on the spot, and fell victims to it. The evidences in the cases of both humans and canines seem to me to point to neglect and starvation as the indirect, and overheating followed by dampness and chill as the direct, cause of the disasters. * * *

The baying of the hounds grew louder every instant, until at length they came in sight around a tree. We looked up, and Conner pointed out to me a savage-looking wild-cat crouching on a branch, his yellow eyes glistening in the sunlight. I gave him both barrels of buck. He clung an instant and tumbled headlong, and the dogs pounced upon him. Conner skinned him in a trice, and calling the dogs off, we left his carcass to the buzzards. Another wild-cat fell a few minutes later to Conner's breech-loader, and the hounds gave tongue twice after game that we did not see. From the tracks, which were numerous, we concluded that they were deer. A short walk brought us to an old sugar-cane field, distinguishable from the rest of the hammock only by comparative thinness of the underbrush and the smaller size of the trees. At one end of it was a burial mound, into which some one had been digging for relics. Human teeth and fragments of bones and bits of ancient Indian pottery lay scattered through the brown sand. In the field we saw tracks which Conner pronounced those of a wild sow and her young one, and he promised, should he meet them, to give us roast pig for supper. A large black snake glided into the bushes in front of me, and two large black-billed woodpeckers flew through the trees above. Further on we came to a half-finished log shanty, part of whose roof was neatly thatched with palmetto fans. Conner gave us its history. A young Boston dry goods clerk came down to found a homestead. He worked bravely for a while, made himself liked and his all over hauling logs, and then went back home, saying that the country suited him and all that, but he couldn't stand the solitude.

We found one of our paroquets dead. The little fellows had become quite used to us, and would eat and drink from our hands. We cut small saplings and stuck them into the earth near the tent while cleaning and putting the birds to roast on them. There they would remain all day. At night we placed them under a box. On the march they sat on our hats, as grave as owls, paying no attention to our shooting, and squawking angrily only when a twig came too near them or the spray from a paddle happened to fall upon their feathers. We gathered them palmetto berries and yam cones, and gave them a liberal supply of corn, soda biscuits, and anything else we thought they would relish. As soon, however, as his comrade died, the survivor at once grew astonishingly tame. He followed us down to supper, and immediately made an attack upon a piece of raw bacon that was hanging on a pole. He then flew down to our table, and went about tasting of this dish and that. Some pork gravy struck his fancy, and he drank several swallows of it. Seeing one picking at the leg of a bird, he coolly took it out of my hand and gnawed it clean. A piece of cheese that I had just taken in my fingers was also snatched away and eaten with evident relish. But the molasses proved his weakness. He sipped and sipped until we thought he would burst. After that he would let any of us handle him as we pleased, even making the least attempt to bite, would sit on our shoulders or hats or knees all day, and would squawk loudly if left alone for a moment. He has become a great pet. L. F. K.

PIGS BITTEN BY A MAD DOG.

An extraordinary case came before Mr. J. Stewart Hardy, member of Parliament, recently, at the West Kent Quarter Sessions, England, in which Samuel Edwards, butcher, and James Stacey, laborer, were indicted for stealing the carcasses of three pigs, the property of Sir William Hart Dyke, member of Parliament, at Lullingstone, on the 6th of December. It appeared that on the day mentioned three pigs belonging to Sir William Dyke were bitten by a mad dog, and Sir William at once ordered them to be shot and buried. Edwards was present at the interment, and put some brakes over and under the pigs, remarking that Mr. Glover, the steward, had told him "to bury them clean and decent." On the following morning it became evident, from the disturbed state of the ground, that the pigs had been meddled with, and evidence was speedily forthcoming to show that Edwards and Stacey had taken them over night to the Rye-House station and dispatched them to London. A slaughterman in the Metropolitan Market fetched the pigs from Holborn station, but upon proceeding to dress them he found they had been shot in the head. He thereupon handed them to the inspector. Mr. Douglas Kingsford, on behalf of the prisoners, contended that Sir William Dyke had abandoned his property in the pigs, that they had become part of the soil, and that, therefore, the charge of larceny could not be sustained. On this point, which the learned counsel stated was an entirely new one, the Chairman granted a case, and the prisoners, who were found guilty by the jury, were liberated on bail. On the charge of selling the meat no evidence was offered.

UNCOMMON LIBERALITY.

The Indianapolis Journal of Wednesday says:

"On the night of the Academy of Music fire, four drivers on the Illinois street car line, being cut off from the stables by hose across the track, voluntarily made trips north until 2 o'clock in the morning, taking in $15 or $20 extra for the company. The management munificently rewarded the enterprising drivers for their work by adding 15 cents to the weekly pay of each. One of the poor fellows, overwhelmed at such liberality, begged to be allowed to take the amount in installments. He was afraid he could not stand prosperity."

SECOND GROWTH OF HAIR.

The Fall River (Mass.) News says: "Mrs. Hannah Spooner, of East Freetown, new in her 84th year, was prostrated by a severe illness about a year since, and her hair entirely came off. After she became convalescent indications of a second growth appeared, and now she has a profusion of long curly hair of which a young lady of a quarter of her years might well be proud."

RAPID TRANSIT.

ELEVATED RAILWAYS DENOUNCED.

OBJECTIONS TO CITY MANAGEMENT OF RAILROADS—THE ELEVATED RAILWAY SCHEME DENOUNCED AS A FRAUD—PROPERTY RUINED FOR SPECULATIVE PURPOSES—THE FINANCIAL ASPECT OF THE CASE—HOW RAPID TRANSIT CAN BE ACCOMPLISHED.

Notwithstanding all that has been said and done in connection with the subject of a more speedy communication between the two extremes of the City of New-York, there still remains a great deal of misconception in the public mind as to the real merits of the questions involved, and scores of individuals, otherwise intelligent, find it utterly impossible to form any idea as to what is really needed or what plan or plans are the most practicable and rational. The recent action of an association of persons in Westchester County having in view the purchase by the City of certain street railways, and a similar movement on the part of a number of individuals doing business in the lower part of the City looking to the same end, both claiming that this is one of the means to accomplish rapid transit, is, to say the least, a very singular proceeding. Why the City of New-York should be called upon at this time to go into the street railway business, and why such persons as Brown Brothers & Co., Drexel, Morgan & Co., Horace B. Claflin & Co., should lend their names to such a suggestion is to my mind incomprehensible. These parties petition the Board of Aldermen to avail themselves of certain privileges which they are said to legally possess to purchase these street railways for the City of New-York. Let us imagine the Board of Aldermen going into a Committee of the Whole on the management of the horse-cars, after appropriating several millions of dollars for their purchase. Consider for a moment the duties devolving upon these over-worked servants of the people by this new departure in municipal government. For instance, the committee on purchasing horses would be compelled to spend most of their valuable time on the boulevards, testing the speed and mettle of the steeds that were to be purchased. They would there be exposed to all the temptations of the numerous refreshment saloons which there abound. The committee on supplies would have to spend a great deal of time in Chicago watching the market for oats. Chicago is also a dangerous place to unsophisticated Eastern people. Then think of the pressure from their constituents for positions as conductors and drivers at salaries of $2,000 or $3,000 a year, with a possible demand for increased compensation every year or two. I do not think that Messrs. Brown Brothers, Drexel, Morgan & Co., and Claflin & Co. could have taken all these things into consideration when they signed that petition, and therefore I think that they misconceived this question of rapid transit. I do not think that Mr. Claflin, if he wrote that petition, and who lives over in Brooklyn, reflected, in his great anxiety for the welfare of the City of New-York, that there was a limit of endurance to the capacity even of a New-York Alderman, and that to impose upon him the additional duties involved in running horse-cars would be an act of unnecessary cruelty—none the less painful from being suggested by a resident of another city.

But these gentlemen went further than this; they insisted upon it that all obstacles should at once be removed that have hitherto prevented certain individuals of a speculative turn of mind from taking possession of the leading commercial avenues of the City and converting them into steam railway routes. It is possible that they may not have labored under any misconception in making this last suggestion; that depends entirely upon how much property they own in Westchester County and in Brooklyn. By the wholesale destruction of property values in the City of New-York, which would follow the introduction of steam railways into the principal avenues, property in Brooklyn and Westchester would undoubtedly be increased in value to an enormous extent, as both business and residence would be forced into a change of location. But how is it with the unfortunate victims whose property is destroyed, and whose only crime is that of being residents and tax-payers in New-York instead of Westchester and Brooklyn? These gentlemen, in their zeal for public improvements and the public good, have, however, gone a step further—which is, if possible, more serious than the other two propositions they make—and they unqualifiedly indorse the erection in all these leading avenues of certain iron structures called "The Gilbert Elevated Railroad" and "The New-York Elevated Railroad." Now, will Mr. Claflin, Mr. Brown, or Mr. Drexel, or any of the members of the association in Westchester County that has been referred to, give to the public of their own knowledge a description of either of these structures? Will they certify to the public that they are constructed upon correct engineering principles, or in accordance with any principles governing the use of this material? Will they guarantee that by means of these structures rapid transit will be secured? Will they insure the lives of those who venture upon these contrivances? Will they deny that in the event of these erections being permitted and their avenues transformed into steam railway routes, the property will depreciate from $25,000,000 to $50,000,000? Finally, when they indorsed these constructions, did they know anything at all about them, or did they give their indorsements at the suggestion and request of persons pecuniarily interested in the success of the schemes? From my knowledge of these gentlemen, and the character they have hitherto borne for respectability and intelligence, I am constrained to believe that they have failed to comprehend the precise character of the questions at issue as connected with rapid transit, and have committed themselves to a line of policy which is calculated to defeat the ends they have in view.

A "BIG BONANZA" IN RAPID TRANSIT.

If rapid transit is ever to be accomplished, it must be by the consent and co-operation of the whole City, including the great body of property-holders and tax-payers, who, in spite of a very general impression that has obtained to the contrary, have rights that must be respected. The assumption that the street railway companies are the obstacles that stand in the way of rapid transit is entirely erroneous, and the idea that by attacking these companies, under the head of "War on Monopolies," rapid transit is to be accomplished, is simply absurd. The truth is that the rapid transit schemers are themselves the obstacle to the accomplishment of this great desideratum, and this fact can be easily demonstrated to the entire satisfaction of any citizen who will take pains to look into the subject. Quick transit for the City of New-York is a present necessity which time will increase until it becomes an accomplished fact. This necessity, arising from the peculiar topographical location of the City, has been long recognized by every intelligent citizen, and the idea has vividly presented itself to the minds of astute speculators for a number of years that there was a "big bonanza" in the job. So great have been these pecuniary allurements that very large sums of money have from time to time been expended by credulous and confiding speculators to secure the control of vested rights under which a monopoly of quick passenger transit could be obtained. Probably not one in 10,000 of our citizens is aware of the fact that the statute books contain at this time legislative enactments by which the finest avenues of the City, and nearly all of them at that, are devoted, from the Battery to the Harlem River, to steam railway traffic, and converted from commercial purposes into steam railway routes. Now, the most casual observer who has passed through any city of the United States, or any city in the world, intersected by steam railway avenues, cannot fail to have recognized the fact that property along those avenues reaches invariably the lowest point of depreciation. The buildings along these steam railway routes are the architectural scenes of otherwise well-built cities, and it is the general complaint that tourists and railway travelers generally see the worst features of every city from the railway cars. If, passing from these avenues in any city, we go to the tax offices and examine the assessment books, we find that this depreciation of value is officially recognized to such a degree that in some instances the difference in assessed value between this property and that of adjoining avenues is as high as 90 per cent. Is it, then, a matter of surprise that the owners of two or three hundred millions of property, comprising the most valuable and most highly-improved part of the City, should protest against a needless vandalism, and should struggle to save their property from destruction and themselves from pecuniary ruin?

The only clear and positive demonstration of absolute rapid transit is found in the interconnection system of the City of London. That is to say, 60 miles an hour—1,200 trains a day, three minutes apart, on a solid road bed, 75,000,000 passengers a year. Our street railways move 165,000,000 passengers a year in cars two miles apart but only at six miles an hour. This is the difference between New-York and London transit. We carry double the number of passengers, but they carry them 10 times faster than we do. How can we reach 60 miles an hour? Evidently not by the affair now in operation in Greenwich street and Ninth avenue, or anything similar to it. That can only move about 10 miles an hour, a very little faster than the horse cars, has a limited capacity, and is attended with too much risk. As a tender to a branch of the Hudson River Railroad at Thirtieth street, it has been a certain convenience to the passengers by that branch line. An extension of this structure, with an extra track, and the erection of a similar one through the Sixth and Third avenues, are the means proposed to arrive at the requisite element of speed in New-York transit. This is the present status of the rapid-transit question. By what peculiar process it has arrived at this point, and under what influences, it is perhaps not necessary at this time to discuss. It is sufficient for the present purpose to recognize the fact that certain parties, (how soon they will be called grasping monopolists is merely another question of time,) claim the right to convert the finest avenues in the City into steam railway routes, and by virtue of legislative enactments having in view ostensibly the object of securing rapid-transit from one extremity of the City to the other. The destruction of property values consequent on the conversion of these fine avenues into steam railway routes does not seem to be questioned, or that it is assumed that this is a necessary sacrifice of private rights and private interests to the public good.

THE RIGHTS OF PROPERTY-OWNERS.

Of course, it would be a difficult matter to persuade any unfortunate citizen whose property is thus ruthlessly destroyed to take this extremely liberal view of things; but it is well to consider whether this question of individual rights does not concern every citizen as much as it does those who are immediately wronged. It is estimated that the property along the routes which it is proposed shall be converted into steam railway lines is worth more than $400,000,000. Now, a careful examination of property values in different cities which have steam railway lines running through some of their avenues, shows a depression in property values in some instances as high as 90 per cent., while in no instance has it been found to be less than 50 per cent. Applying the lesser ratio of depreciation to the property which is to be effected by steam lines in New-York, we have a first cost of right of way to be paid by individuals in actual loss of values of over $50,000,000. But this is not all; the property east and west of these lines will be affected almost as much as if a Chinese wall divided it from the rest of the city. Carriages would avoid passing beneath these structures, and the better class of residences, especially families, would regard the inevitable injury to their garments from oil and falling cinders as a necessary exclusion from the outlying territory. A natural result would be a widespread depreciation of property over a large area of the City, thus at least doubling the loss to individuals, making the first cost of this enforced tax $100,000,000. When this depreciation of value comes to be considered by the Assessors there will be an enormous reduction in the revenues of the City, which will represent the annual tribute of the City at large to this colossal fraud.

Suppose that the people have submitted to this outrage and the structures as proposed is completed, what will it be? It will be something that no engineer in the world has ever dreamed of; something that no engineer who knew his business would ever construct, and something that no man uninfluenced by cupidity would ever offer for public use. In the first place, it is nothing more or less than a continuous bridge, but without abutments or piers, thus having no substantial foundation whatever. Even the Ashtabula bridge had a firm foundation, and is not that holocaust enough for one generation to offer up? The meager supports that are the substitutes for piers are constructed in utter disregard of every principle governing the use of iron as a building material. They are weak and unsubstantial in character, and bear no relation, either practically or theoretically, to the other parts of the structure. More than all this, the material used bears with it always the elements of its own destruction, that nothing short of a miracle can prevent. It cannot secure the element of speed, and it would be thus become an absolute impediment to rapid transit. It stands in the way of what the City needs. It would only be put up to be taken down, like the Broadway bridge. It cannot sustain the weight of an engine sufficiently powerful to accomplish what is wanted, and would be the best be a very poor substitute for the horse cars, which have the merit of very great convenience, which a railway in the air could not possibly have.

It has been urged that the Greenwich street elevated road is successful rapid transit, but it cannot surely be supposed for a moment that the citizens of New-York are to be content with 10 miles an hour for the solution of this problem. The Greenwich street road in reality bears the same relation to a true system of rapid transit as the tight-rope walker does to the ordinary pedestrian. It is an absurdity every way—and when compared to London quick transit is more unessential toy. The changes that are constantly going on in the internal condition of iron under such use as causes it to vibrate sooner or later destroys its tenacity entirely, and it falls in pieces. This is a law which governs it as absolutely as the laws that govern the motion of the tides, and it is sheer madness to entice people on such a structure where death is constantly staring them in the face.

RAPID TRANSIT FINANCIAL MANAGEMENT.

But the worst features of this reckless scheme are the inner workings of its financial management. It will be borne in mind that the Rapid Transit Commissioners intimated, or rather stated, in their report, that they were forced to forego some important considerations in order to secure the co-operation of capital; or, in other words, that stability must be sacrificed to economy of structure, to induce parties to supply the means of building it. Pernicious as this assumption appears on the face of it, it has in its practical working developed into results that seem to be in their character the extraordinary financial manipulations of the infamous Credit Mobilier, under the auspices of which the Pacific Railway was built with millions of the people's money and land enough to found an empire, yet leaving it in the hands of a few speculators who never put one honest dollar into the enterprise. This is to be repeated in the Metropolis, under the guise of rapid transit! Let us see. By the testimony before the Supreme Court, it appears that an organization of individuals calling themselves "The New-York Loan and Improvement Company," have purchased from one "Dr." Gilbert, his patent rights and other contrivances, together with certain privileges he claimed to possess for occupying the streets and avenues of New-York with these patent contrivances, under the name of rapid transit. This Loan and Improvement Company occupies the same relation to rapid transit that the Credit Mobilier did to the Pacific Railway. Having contracted with a concern in Delaware or Maryland to erect a structure mostly of sheet-iron, at something less than $300,000 per mile, they arrange to issue securities to the modest amount of $2,500,000 per mile, viz.: $1,000,000 first mortgage bonds; $1,000,000 secured mortgage bonds, and $500,000 in stock; that is to say, if the road is 10 miles long, they will build it for $3,000,000, and have $25,000,000 to pay for it, or a profit of $22,000,000. Truly a "big bonanza." The obligations which here arise should claim the attention of every right-minded citizen of New-York. Shall the property of our citizens be thus ruthlessly sacrificed in the sole interests of private speculation? Shall the masses of our people pay a tribute of $25,000,000, for what costs but $3,000,000? Shall a contrivance that can never afford rapid transit be erected that will prevent the construction of a proper and actual rapid transit road? Shall the citizens of New-York lend themselves to a scheme that has no merits beyond that of an audacious speculation upon the necessities of the Metropolis? For $2,500,000 per mile a road can be built that will pay for all damage to property; will not interfere with commerce or residence; will carry passengers at a minimum rate of cost, and at a maximum rate of speed, with comfort, safety, and convenience. Capitalists are ready to invest their money in this plan as soon as the obstacles which speculators have placed in the way shall be removed by the fiat of the law and the voice of public opinion.

A CITIZEN.

ANOTHER CHILD ROBBED.

The Philadelphia Press of the 3d inst. says: "About 10 o'clock on Thursday morning, Kate Butler, aged nearly 4 years, residing at No. 435 Pine street, Camden, was missed from her home, and a vigorous search failed to reveal her whereabouts until late in the afternoon. In the morning the child was sent to a store in the neighborhood to purchase some candy, and, after doing so, was seized by two large girls, who saw her go in the store, and took the sweetmeats from her. She was then dragged along the street, and a long distance on Fifth street, into North Camden. Here the girls were observed by a lady, who was passing, to beat and shake the child in a cruel manner. The youngster was weeping bitterly, and the lady remonstrated with the girls, who, seeing that they were to be interfered with, let the child go and ran away. After considerable trouble, the rescuer of the little Miss Butler learned from the frightened child where her parents resided, and then she took the child home. The girls had kettles with them filled with soup, which indicated they had been to the soup-house. They took the ribbons from the child's hair, and, it is supposed, intended to take her to their dwelling, where she would have been robbed of her clothing, and then turned loose, or else used for begging purposes. A description of the girls could not be obtained, but one is described as tall, and the other medium height, and they were very shabbily dressed."

A DEFAULTER SENT TO PRISON.

The Milwaukee (Wis.) Sentinel of the 1st inst. says: "George M. Wheeler, the defaulting banker of La Crosse, was sentenced yesterday to five years in the Penitentiary. Less than two years ago this man stood high in business circles, and was a social leader; his capital was fictitious, however, from the beginning, and when the exposure of his hollowness as a business man approached, he became a thief. None of the sympathy one feels for an honest man who falls, or for a well-meaning but weak man who succumbs to a momentary wrong impulse, can be extended to him. He was willfully bad, a rascal by choice, and there will be found no one to say his sentence is too severe."

NEW PUBLICATIONS.

THANKFUL BLOSSOM, A Romance of the Jersey, 1779. By BRET HARTE. Illustrated. Boston: JAMES R. OSGOOD & Co. 1877.

It is something of an event when a writer of the reputation of Mr. Bret Harte comes out with a new tale, especially when it is a centennial story. But is it possible for anybody, in cold blood, to sit down and write a satisfactory romance which shall bring to this end of the hundred years the events and customs of that? In some such doubting spirit, then, do we open Thankful Blossom, already considerably mystified by the name itself. Part first begins with all of the old exact condensation of Bret Harte's best stories. He is painting with a simplicity that smacks sometimes of the intentionally severe the background of his picture in a few terse pages. There are few writers who can do this so energetically and well. Mr. Harte is evidently a close observer of nature in particular seasons, even if he be not by character a student of landscape. Presently enters on this well-drawn scene a horseman who, while still "viewless," is heard in impressions. The character of Brewster, the Connecticut Colonel, is indicated from the start; he is the villain of the piece. A love-scene with a pretty girl informs us that he is a selfish dog, and that Thankful Blossom is the name of his inamorata. Comedy in a low key, not without an edge of spitefulness, is brought to bear on Brewster. He has ridden over from Washington's camp on the sly, and has accepted from Thankful certain chickens and other eatables which the girl has providently brought with her from the neighboring farm-house—her home:

"'I think not of myself, lass,' he said, putting the eggs in his pocket, and buttoning the chickens within his martial breast. 'I think not of myself, and perhaps I often spare this comrade which is but little heeded. But I have a duty to my men—to Connecticut.' (He here tied the marmalade up in his handkerchief.")

They separate, and presently Brewster is arrested by order of Gen. Washington for seditious language, and, in order to cover him still further with ridicule, the eggs are broken in his pocket at the moment of his greatest theatrical effort.

Part second begins with another of Mr. Harte's delightful bits of description. Thankful glides home through the orchard, lingering a moment under each tree "as a trout lingers in the shadow of a bank in passing a shallow." She meets her father, and the plot begins to thicken, for there are two foreigners in the house, one of whom Father Blossom appears not averse to securing for a son-in-law. The great frankness and truthfulness of Thankful is insisted upon, while she is described as effacing the rumpled condition of her hair after her lover's embrace in preparation for a little contingency from some one else. She then proceeds to accept the kiss of one of the foreigners, although she collects herself sufficiently afterward to box his ears. At this place Mr. Harte makes one of his good points:

"Mistress Thankful and the Baron had walked to the rear door—the Baron with a slight tropical shudder—to view this meteorological change. As Mistress Thankful looked over the snowy landscape, it seemed to her that all record of her past experience had been effaced; her very foot-prints of an hour before were lost; the gray wall on which she leaned was white and spotless now; even the familiar farm-shed looked dim and strange and ghostly. Had she been there? had she seen the Colonel? was it all a fancy? she scarcely knew."

The foreigners leave, and Major Van Zandt arrives to tell Thankful of the arrest both of her father and Col. Allan Brewster. As she insists on riding straight to Gen. Washington to protest, Major Van Zandt manages clumsily enough to hold her horse while telling her something in a kindly spirit, so that she, fancying he wishes to detain her, strikes him with her whip. She is thinking hard while she rides:

"And lastly she thought of her father, and began to hate everybody. But above all and through all, in her vague fears for her father, in her passionate indignation against the Baron, in her fretful impatience of Allan, one thing was ever dominant and obtrusive, one thing she tried to put away, but could not—the handsome, colorless face of Major Van Zandt, with the red welt of her riding-whip overlying its cold surface."

Of course she marries Van Zandt after that. The Baron and his friend turn out to be Spanish Ambassadors in some peculiar way, and one perishes miserably, without adequate reason, of typhoid fever. Thankful interviews the Father of his Country, and finds him decidedly affectionate. In fact, while Mr. Harte takes pains to show him personally in the shape of "a King," the highest of an aristocracy, he loses no occasion to hint at a reverse side of Washington's moral character. He even makes him indulge in something like a lie—probably to counter-balance the hatchet story. Brewster's manifest currishness cures Thankful of her love for him. She is treated with great kindness by the Washingtons, and in Part IV returns home to discover herself in love with Major Van Zandt. The crisis is reached as she rescues him after a most improbable fashion from some boggy hole into which he falls while they take a walk through the meadows in Spring. But Col. Brewster is brought to the farm as a prisoner, and in order to get her letters back and break her engagement thoroughly, Thankful assists him to escape. On telling this to Van Zandt she suddenly discovers that she has spoiled everything, for he will not be able to forgive her. Thereupon she sends him after the first fugitive lover on a faster horse, which she has providently concealed from Brewster. Van Zandt's horse falls dead of fatigue at Springfield, and as he himself at once falls ill of small-pox, (!) it is well that Thankful has fellowed on his heels in order to become his nurse. His face is pitted for life, but she heroically takes him, and the play is o'er.

A play the whole story is. The language and plot are cast like something meant eventually for the stage. It is outside work from beginning to end; hardly a bit of it consists of character-drawing or anything but surface action between persons. Toward the end this is disagreeably apparent, for Van Zandt and Thankful hurl sentences at each other in a manner truly melodramatic. Yet this may possibly come from the slightly stilted language wherewith Mr. Harte has wished to give a tinge of Revolutionary times. It is a lively performance throughout, and soon read. Yet one feels that Mr. Harte is irritated at something while one reads, for there is a very different tone in this story from that in the first prose tales we have from him. After all, does not his genius lie in the West? It is said that people who have lived long in the West can seldom support the habits, the imperceptible differences of air and life, in the East. Perhaps Mr. Harte is suffering from nostalgia, both personal and literary, and perhaps he does not know it. Yet it would seem that his place is where his best work has been performed. Thankful Blossom, while it shows no advance on Mr. Harte's past, is still well worth a reading.

—The School and Home Journal is the title of a new weekly publication treating of educational and cognate subjects in a broad, liberal, and enlightened spirit. The number before us (second) contains a great variety of judiciously selected matter in prose and verse; but while these lend variety and charm, the permanent success of such a publication must mainly depend on the tone and ability of the editorial and original contributions. In this department a few of the articles are worthy of special notice. The editorial comments on the reduction of the grant for educational purposes in the City are timely, temperate, and to the point. There is also an ably written article on "Valedictory," and a paper of great value on the normal instruction in the City of New-York. In the interest of sound literature and educational progress we wish the School and Home Journal success.

If old sailors know how to spin many pleasant yarns, one may expect a Commodore of the United States Navy to write a good book, the difference between intellects keeping pace with that between ranks. Commodore Parker is already an author, although an author of naval text-books. One is Fleet Tactics under Steam; another, The Howitzer Afloat; another, The Howitzer Ashore, and still another, Squadron Tactics, although, probably, few besides naval students know much of such technical publications. In The Fleets of the World, however, the gallant Commodore launches his bark on the general sea of literature, and has good reason to hope that every one fond of reading about stiff sea-fights will be pleased with his work. As the title indicates, the present volume is a preliminary to further investigations in the same line, and merely comprises a review of the fleets of the world which were made up of galleys, and, therefore, existed in an age when historical records were not abundant. From the earliest instances which history records—from Chinese navies as mentioned in their earliest annals—Commodore Parker brings his subject in the course of the present volume down to Sir Francis Drake and the Spanish Armada. The claims of China, Egypt, and Phœnicia to recognition are quickly disposed of; only when Greek history is reached do the records become full, and we enter on a wide range of subject matter. It is at this point of the history that a first illustration represents the bow of Greek or Roman galley; it is drawn by Albert Ross, United States Navy, from a painting in the National Museum at Naples, as are also the other illustrations. After accounts of the most celebrated naval engagements of Greece, of Rome against Carthage, and of Romans against Romans, Commodore Parker follows the checkered career of Venetians, Genoese, and Turks during their struggles for the supremacy of the Mediterranean. With the battle of Lepante and the destruction of the Turkish naval strength, he leaves the Mediterranean for the North Sea. But he does not allow these scenes of classic naval prowess to pass without comment designed to instruct naval officers of the present day. The contests of Athenians and Corinthians point the axiom for squadrons, that: "Under all circumstances afloat, the circle formation, as a defensive order, in itself involves defeat."

The naval wars between Carthage and Rome are made to yield the following application to modern times:

"A careful study of this great sea-fight, [between the Consuls Manlius and Regulus and Hamilcar,] in all its details, can not fail to prove instructive to the naval officers of the present day, when steamers have taken the place of the ancient war galleys, and, with proper turning-power, (without which a steamer, whatever her speed, armament, or armor, is unworthy of a place in the line of battle,) may and should be manœuvred on precisely similar principles."

After the Mediterranean come the Baltic and North Seas, with Scandinavian pirates, vikings and sea-kings. Through them the transition to the English Navy is easy, and the book ends with the dispersal of the Grand Armada. Commodore Parker can hardly be said "to have his sealegs on him" as a historian, but his purpose is an excellent one and his manner of telling his story direct. The subject is so large that he cannot do more than take a choice of the greatest and most important naval engagements and let the minor affairs go. Perhaps as he reaches modern times his method will be more concentrated. The naval history even of the United States would afford scope for more than one careful volume by a man who should seriously apply his time to the work, and the present work suffers from a want of limiting the subject to certain specific heads. The illustrations are also of inferior quality.

CHAMBERS'S CYCLOPÆDIA OF ENGLISH LITERATURE. Edinburgh: W. & R. CHAMBERS. New-York: R. WORTHINGTON. Philadelphia: J. B. LIPPINCOTT & Co.

Of the many valuable works issued by W. & R. Chambers, the Cyclopædia of English Literature has no equal in the estimation of the public. It was a "new idea" in 1845, when the first edition was printed, and although many blunders crept into the work when it appeared first, it was eagerly bought up. The duty of making the selections from the great English classic writers was intrusted to the late Robert Chambers. Previous to the publication of the Cyclopædia, Mr. Chambers had issued in a cheap form selections from the writings of illustrious and clever, but obscure, Scotch poets, with notes and biograph ical and critical remarks added. It was the success of this series of publications which emboldened him to enter upon the wider, but still unoccupied, field of giving to the world a regular chronologically-arranged cyclopædia of English literature. The work has gone through four editions, the last having just been issued. The new edition has been thoroughly revised by that great literary veteran, Mr. Carruthers, of Inverness, and for the first time, biographical sketches of American authors, together with extracts from their works, have been added. The new light which has been thrown lately on early English literature, more particularly the early English drama, by the researches of Halliwell, Collier, Hazlitt, (Carew,) Arber, and others, has rendered necessary the alteration of the text in several places. This work has been competently done by Mr. Carruthers, and the cyclopædia is a most valuable miniature library of English literature. We notice that the small engravings of places made famous by great men and many of the portraits have not been retained in this new edition. Instead of these, a few pages of portraits only have been inserted in appropriate places. On the whole, the work is invaluable to all students of English literature.

It is some years since Mr. Boyesen won all hearts by his fresh little novel of Norwegian life, under the title of Gunnar. Since then he has published A Norseman's Pilgrimage—a novel in which the young Scandinavian is on his voyage to foreign countries, and comes in contact with Americans. Mr. Boyesen has also been writing for all the leading magazines, and in the present volume has collected together some six of his shorter stories. In all that he has written outside the charming influence of Norway we confess to missing some of the freshness and grace that made Gunnar so attractive. But the surest foundation of that little story consisted in a cleanliness and wholesomeness of thought that has not deserted the later products of Boyesen. Though their author is not in any way a professed moralist nor one who strives after a moral purpose, the tone of these stories is elevated without effort; they move in a high atmosphere of unconsciously good morals. In respect to style, Mr. Boyesen has the faculty of keeping himself out of his stories, notwithstanding that he may be dimly picturing some of his own adventures. His favorite field is Scandinavia in America, or the trials and success of Scandinavian men in the United States. But the personal unobtrusiveness to which we refer is something less general; it relates to the manner of recounting his stories. Having understood that the point (of the story) is the story, he goes directly to the point instead of reflecting in the text his own personality—his own impressions. Hence he does not trouble us with his own thoughts and feelings about the course of events, after the fitrospective and conscious manner of some writers. With all these good things Mr. Boyeson has need to live longer in the United States before he can hope to deal as powerfully with American characters as with Scandinavian. Marvelous as his adaptability is, it would be little short of a miracle if he did not occasionally fall short in some trifling detail which disturbs the color of a story a little. As it is, he is doing excellent work, and appears to have plenty of fire and hope, plenty of desire for improvement in him, and that is something which can be said of how many of our own native-born writers?

The tales which are called of two hemispheres consist of The Man Who Lost his Name, the hero of which is a young Norwegian in New-York. The Story of an Outcast is a powerful tale of Norway and America, which treats of nonmoral topics in the clean way we have already noted. A Good-for-nothing and A Scientific Vagabond are good. The first embodies with a good deal of delicacy the fact, of doubtless frequent occurrence, that the girl one leaves behind one stands still where she was, and that the young pilgrim who has seen the world often returns to find, with a shock, that the beloved face is a mere memory of love. Most pleasing is Truls, the Nameless, which deals exclusively with Norway, and has the charm of Gunnar, with tragedy added. Almost as good will Asathor's Vengeance be found, and that, too, runs its course in the old country. Mr. Boyesen has two dangers to face in stories of American scenery, one that he is, after all, foreign-born, and the other, that to Americans the author's motherland affords a picturesqueness we have not yet learned to discover in our own country.

LITERARY NOTES.

—Lippincott's Magazine is seeking an English audience.

—MM. Feuillet and Cherbuliez are both engaged upon new novels.

— The ninth and tenth volumes of Longfellow's Poems of Places are devoted to France and Savoy.

—It sounds odd to read the title of Dr. Holmes' Autocrat of the Breakfast Table in German as Der Tisch-Despot.

—Capt. Markham, of the Royal Navy, is contributing to Good Words a series of articles on "Our Life in the Arctic Regions."

—Rev. Dr. Samuel Davidson, of Halle, is the author of a new treatise on The Canon of the Bible, its Formation, History, and Fluctuations.

—The Autobiographical Recollections of Sir John Bowring, edited by Lewin B. Bowring, is one of Henry S. King & Co.'s forthcoming books.

—The new library edition of Tennyson, in six demy-octavo volumes, is said to be the handsomest style in which the poet's works have yet been published.

—The late Alexander Bain has an article in the January number of Mind on "Education as a Science," and H. Sidgwick, the author of "The Methods of Ethics," writes upon "Hedonism and the Ultimate Good."

—Miss M. Beltram-Edwards is engaged upon hand-books of German and French literature, adapted to the wants of ordinary students and yet simple enough for the use of young people in preparing for examinations.

—A literary curiosity, of which only 30 copies will be printed, is Mr. Edmund Chester Waters' Genealogical Memoirs of the Kindred Families of Thomas Cranmer, Archbishop of Canturbury, 1533–56, and Thomas Wood, Bishop of Lichfield, 1671–92.

—Richard Shute, Lecturer on Philosophy at the University of Oxford, is the author of a new metaphysical treatise against the sensational school of philosophy as represented by J. S. Mill. Mr. Shute bases his views upon Locke, and entitles his work A Discourse of Truth.

—Mrs. Oliphant has been successful in fiction and biography, and now, in defauls of other worlds of literary venture to conquer, announces her purpose to edit a series of Foreign Classics for English Readers, which Scribner, Armstrong & Co. purpose to reproduce in this country.

—The Life of Jesus Christ for the Young, by Rev. Dr. Richard Newton, to be published in 40 monthly parts at 25 cents each, and to be fully illustrated with steel engravings and wood-cuts, is one of the latest ventures in serial publication, by Gebbie & Barrie, Philadelphia, but is a very sostly way of furnishing young people with good religious reading.

—Messrs. Sampson Low & Co. are to have a monthly periodical of their own, entitled Street Life in London, the joint production of Mr. J. Thomson, author of Illustrations of China and its People," and Mr. Adolphe Smith. An interesting feature of the magazine will be monthly accounts of some phases of London life, illustrated by photographs specially taken for the work.

—Fresh topics are largely wanting in the current Edinburgh and Quarterly Reviews. "The Geographical and Scientific Results of the Arctic Expedition" is the most notable article in the Quarterly, and the Edinburgh discusses the same subject under the head of "New Arctic Lands." Both reviews discuss the "Eastern Question" up to date, and are largely occupied with articles of a strictly literary character.

—A. S. Barnes & Co. have nearly ready an Illustrated Plant Record prepared by Alphonso Wood for the use of students in recording botanical analyses of all specimens observed. They have in preparation a valuable compilation of references, interleaved with blanks for the reader's own use, entitled Fox's Common-Place Book, and a Critical History of the late Civil War in the United States, by Rev. Asa Hahan, D. D., first President of Oberlin College, and now resident in London.

OUR COMPANY IN MISERY.

The Philadelphia Press of Saturday says:

"Is it not about time the gentlemen who have taken contracts for cleaning the streets ceased hibernating and paid some attention to the condition of our thoroughfares? Within the past few days the exceptional moderation in the weather has made it possible for citizens to loosen the heretofore impregnable fortifications of ice and snow along the various curbs, and the consequence of this is that many of the crossings are covered with water, while the roadways are filled with chunks of ice floating in slush. In some parts of the city the sewer inlets are completely blocked, and in others so nearly so that the waste water, instead of quickly escaping remains standing, and should the mercury again descend, will freeze so solid that its dislodgment will be practically impossible. A little care at comparatively small expense at this season will be of inestimable benefit to residents, and no time should be lost in the effort to remedy an evil already suffered to exist much longer than necessary."

MONDAY, Feb. 5—A. M.

The statement of the Associated Banks, issued from the Clearing-house on Saturday last, shows a decrease in specie of $1,881,900, which is, doubtless, in part due to the operations of the syndicate. The continued flow of currency to this centre is reflected in the gain of $1,053,900 in the legal-tender item. The other changes are an increase of $855,700 in loans, and of $466,100 in deposits, and a decrease of $67,600 in circulation. The movement for the week results in a loss of $944,525 in surplus reserve, and the banks now hold $23,837,275 in excess of legal requirements.

The following shows the condition of the banks on Saturday last, as compared with the previous statement, and with the statement for the corresponding week last year:

	Jan. 27.	Feb. 3.	Feb. 5, 1876.

Legal tenders	42,251,300	43,305,100 Inc.	1,053,900
Excess of res've above legal requirements	24,781,800	23,837,275 Dec.	944,525

There was no change in the monetary situation, and rates were very steady throughout the week. The supply of loanable funds has been augmented by the steady influx of currency from the interior, and the banks and trust companies have found it difficult to fully employ their surplus money. The banks have now on hand fully $4,000,000 more legal tenders and nearly $15,000,000 more specie than at this time last year. The rates for call loans ranged from 3 to 5 per cent., with 4 per cent. as the ruling rate. Commercial paper was in good demand, and business was quite active among the note brokers. Sales were at 4@4½ per cent. for prime, and 5@6 for names less known. The supply of paper in the market was small.

The foreign advices were not especially important. In the London market Consols, as usual of late, were influenced by the various reports in regard to the peace negotiations, but the changes were compassed within a narrow range, the closing quotations being ¼ ₱ cent. below those of the previous week. United States bonds were firm, and prices were well supported. The Bank of England lost £580,000 bullion for the week ending Wednesday. On Thursday £80,000 went into the bank, but the withdrawals since then amounted to £234,000. At Paris, Rentes closed at 106f. 30c., against 107f. 3c. on the previous Saturday.

The sterling exchange market was strong under the influence of a small supply of commercial bills. The prices for cotton at Liverpool continue below those at New-York, and shipments of the staple have not been sufficient to keep the market supplied with bills. The leading drawers advanced their rates to $4 85 and $4 86½ for long and short sterling respectively, with actual business close on to these figures.

Speculation in the Gold Room was active at intervals. The price declined from 106 to 104⅞, the lowest point touched since June 12, 1862. The fall in the premium was chiefly due to dispatches from Washington that President Grant would send a Message to Congress urging the resumption of specie payments at an early day. This caused considerable selling for short account, and when the bears commenced to cover there was an upward reaction to 105⅝, the final sales having been at 105⅛. Cash gold was easy at 2 to 5 ₱ cent. for carrying.

Government bonds declined ¼ to 1¼ ₱ cent. in sympathy with gold, and advanced ¼ to ⅜ ₱ cent., when the latter recovered. The transactions were moderately large, a good demand having prevailed during the greater portion of the week. Railroad mortgages were irregular. Milwaukee and St. Paul issues, which were considerably under pressure for weakness last week, recovered from 79¼ to 82½ for Consolidated Sinking Funds, and from 96 to 97½ for La Crosse Division. The New-Jersey Central issues declined 1 to 3 ₱ cent., First selling down to 101½ ex interest, 75½ for Consolidated, and 72 for Convertibles. The final sales were at 104, 76½, and 74 respectively. Lehigh and Wilkesbarre Consolidated declined from 55 to 54, and rose to 56. Toledo and Wabash bonds fell off 2¾ ₱ cent. for Firsts, to 102½; 2 for St. Louis Division, to 80½; ½ for Seconds, to 75, and 5½ for Consolidated Convertible, to 50½. Great Western Firsts declined from 105¼ to 103, and Seconds from 75 to 72, the latter closing at 73. C., C. & I. C. Firsts fell off from 36 to 34½, and later rose to 36½. The Pacific issues were firm, and advanced ½@1¼ ₱ cent., closing at the best figures. State bonds were firm on a fair business.

The business on the Stock Exchange was moderate in volume. The dealings in the coal shares were at times attended with considerable excitement, and the fluctuations in the prices of these stocks were wide and frequent. Early in the week it was reported that New-Jersey Central was in hopeless financial trouble, that a default on its interest was certain, and that the company was about to pass into the hands of a Receiver. These reports caused a heavy decline in the stock, and the price dropped from 30 to 21¼. Later, when it was ascertained that some of the leading shareholders had agreed to take up $3,000,000 certificates of indebtedness, and thus enable the company to tide over its difficulties for the present, there was a partial recovery in the price. Delaware and Hudson Canal declined from 65¾ to 56¼, and Delaware, Lackawanna and Western from 72¾ to 67¼, with closing sales respectively at 61 and 69½. The great dullness in the canal trade is one of the chief influences affecting adversely these stocks. It was stated at the close of the week that only a very small portion of the coal disposed of at the recent sales had been taken away by the purchasers. There exists a great anxiety on the part of shareholders in the different coal companies to learn the actual financial condition of the several corporations, so that their property may not be the football of speculators; but the Directors thus far make manifest no disposition to gratify this very reasonable desire. The weakness in Illinois Central continues, and the price fell off from 55¼ to 50¼, with closing transactions at a recovery of 2 ₱ cent. The reports in regard to a decline in the company's earnings are reiterated. The fluctuations in the other shares were less important.

Mr. D. D. Field is to be congratulated on the quality of his witnesses—Maddox, Littlefield, and Pickett. These creatures are depended upon to establish an alleged conspiracy in Louisiana. There is nothing for Field's case, direct or circumstantial, except what these three persons contribute. Maddox, by his own testimony, is a professional stool-pigeon and informer. His story is one of innuendoes. He is one of those fellows who could tell terrible things if he would. But he never does. Littlefield's autobiography is even more entertaining. He says he is a gambler, a hanger-on about livery stables, an immoral person who has lived for years with "a lady" who is not his wife. His comrades were men who made promises, as he says, when they were drunk, which they repudiated when sober. Pickett caps the climax of dissolute adventure. He says that he has always been a sort of political swashbuckler, alternately in the cause of the Confederacy, Cuba, Mexico, Nicaragua Walker, and the Tilden Democracy. He is a man who confesses to no such weakness as that of principle. These are Field's witnesses. On the unsupported word of such adventurers and conscienceless vagabonds the great criminal lawyer proposes to establish Tilden's claim to the Presidency.

The Democratic newspapers pass very lightly over the fact that Gen. Anderson, of the Louisiana Returning Board, positively testifies that $200,000 was offered for the purchase of the Electoral vote of Louisiana for Tilden. There is no attempt to discredit or break down this evidence. Whose money was this? Whose but his who had previously sent thousands of dollars to assist the weak Grover, of Oregon, and other thousands to buy the vote of a Hayes Elector in South Carolina? Let us hear less about the so-called "startling exposure in Louisiana," where, as all agree, no money was received by any officer of the Returning Board for any dishonest purpose. Until the Democrats have explained how it was that one of Tilden's Louisiana agents baldly offered a bribe to secure an Electoral vote for him, they waste their breath in vociferating about reported plans of fraud. Who authorized Dr. W. A. Robertson to offer Gen. Anderson $200,000 to insure Louisiana for Tilden?

Of the twelve great annual appropriation bills, only one—that providing for pensions—has passed both houses of Congress. This one is in the hands of the President. Three others—the Fortifications bill, the Military Academy bill, and that making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic service—are in the hands of conference committees. Two other bills have passed the House and are now in charge of Senate committees, and the rest are yet in process of incubation by House committees. It is gratifying to learn that the backwoods members are not nearly so much interested in the River and Harbor Appropriation bill as formerly. This measure has usually been a huge job. When $5,000 has been appropriated for the improvement of a trout stream in West Virginia, the money has gone into the pockets of some Democratic statesman who took this means to re-elect himself. The President exercised his legal prerogative last year, and expended only what seemed to be needed for the legitimate improvement of rivers and harbors. The trout streams suffered an unexpected drought; and if the bill does not happen to pass at this session, navigation on Pokopunk Creek and the Kanawha will not materially diminish.

A good example of the way in which the Democratic case is to be managed before the Electoral Commission is afforded in a pamphlet on the Florida case, prepared by some expert shyster. It is a judicious selection from the testimony of various witnesses before Field's (late Knott's) committee of the House. Cross-examinations and rebutting testimony are left out, and a mass of half-truths is sent forth with a quasi official sanction to it. No such report has been made to the House; no such report has been prepared for any purpose but that for which it has been used. It is in effect nothing more nor less than an impudent forgery. The Electoral Commission, we take it for granted, will summarily throw it under the table. If the House has a particle of dignity left, it will demand by what authority this insolent theft was committed upon the evidence before a committee, and inquire who is responsible for the premature publication of a garbled report upon matters wholly within the jurisdiction of the House.

The bill for the abolition of the Marine Court in this City has naturally excited much comment among lawyers, to say nothing of the considerable number of persons whose livelihood depends upon a continuance of the institution. The interesting sketch of the origin and history of the court, which we print to-day, shows that the gradual changes which have been effected in this peculiar tribunal have thoroughly and radically modified it. The original intention of the act of 1797 was to make this "a poor man's court," corresponding in most of its features to the Justices' Courts of Massachusetts. There is no longer a vestige of this old-time characteristic. If the Marine Court be not abolished, it should certainly be reorganized in such a way as to make it accomplish the purposes for which it was designed.

Our Washington dispatches state that the advocates of the silver dollar are bent on re-establishing that coin as legal tender whenever anything is done with reference to resumption. Probably with that view Mr. Sherman's bill, to which we have already paid some attention, may be pushed. It is a bad bill. The silver party has conveyed the impression that the measure authorizes the issue of the silver dollar only for the redemption of legal-tender notes, but the language of the bill does not bear such a construction. It is as follows:

"That there shall be, from time to time, coined, at the mints of the United States, silver dollars of the weight of 412½ grains standard silver, in the mode provided in title 37 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, the bullion for which shall be purchased with the bullion fund; and said dollar shall be a legal tender to the same extent and for the same purposes as United States notes, and shall be issued in redemption of United States notes on the demand of the holder, under general regulations of the Secretary of the Treasury. And the United States notes redeemed under this act shall be canceled, and be held to be a part of the sinking fund provided for by existing law, the interest to be computed thereon as in the case of bonds redeemed."

It will be seen that the law directs the issue of the silver dollar for the redemption of the notes, but not for that purpose only, while it is made legal tender for all the debts of the Government except interest on bonds and the principal of bonds expressly payable in gold.

THE PRESIDENT'S RECOMMENDATIONS.

The business men of the United States will turn with relief from the labored discussion of the law and the Constitution before the Electoral Commission to the President's brief but important Message on specie payments. Whatever anxiety there may have been concerning the immediate effect of the Presidential trouble on business, it has now passed away. It never amounted to much, and people who thought that it did were not only more frightened than hurt, but believed themselves more frightened than they actually were, as was shown by the fact that there was not enough real fear to keep the legal-tender notes from steadily advancing. At the present moment even imaginary fear has vanished, and the Presidential question does not stand remotely in the way of business calculations. The Message of the President, on the contrary, relates to a matter of great immediate interest and of permanent importance.

No better time could have been chosen for bringing the financial question clearly before Congress, and whether or not Congress is sufficiently awake to the duty it owes the country to give the subject attention, the service performed by the President is a substantial one. The main objection which has heretofore been urged against any positive and direct action by Congress with reference to the currency has been that no one could foretell its effect on the business of the country with enough certainty to make it safe. This is the only objection which has had any practical value, and the only one which has divided those who were on the whole in favor of a sound currency. Of course, it has been plain, to those who have paid close attention to the subject, that a sound currency could not be reached without more or less embarrassment and inconvenience, but it has been supposed that these conditions would follow on the passage of some law looking to resumption. It has not been generally anticipated that they might come by the natural course of events, and that the time was near at hand when a law leading to resumption might be passed with perfect security, and without any apprehension of injury to business.

This state of things has, however, come to pass. It is as safe now to predict what would be the effect of the principal measures recommended by the President as it could be to predict anything whatever in financial affairs. We know that these measures would not involve any indefinite obligation on the part of the Treasury which it might have difficulty in meeting. No blow to the public credit, and no injury to business that would necessarily follow, can be looked for from a gradual accumulation of gold by the sale of 4½ per cent. bonds, or from requiring the banks to hold a portion of their reserve in gold, or from funding the legal tenders in a long 4 per cent. bond. On the contrary, each of these measures would unqualifiedly strengthen the public credit, give stability to the Government securities, and impart a feeling of confidence touching the relations of the Government to the money market.

In the same way, we may disregard the apprehension which many very sincere friends of hard money have felt that positive legislation toward resumption would cause a violent change in the currency, first by direct contraction, and second by the exaggerated impression of contraction produced in the public mind. There was some cause for this fear a few years since. When speculation was rife, and the demand for currency was active and often feverish, an impulse in this direction might easily have led to unpleasant consequences. We have long held that hardly any price would be too much to pay for relief from the desperate disorders of our currency, and that the inconveniences following the remedy would be less, and would be more easily recovered from, if we had the courage to take decisive action than if we waited for the slower but equally sure working of natural forces. But that question need not be discussed now. We did not administer the remedy, and we did wait for the consequences to come without our own act. There is nothing more to fear. Three years ago the country was vexed with heated argument as to whether its business could stand contraction. We have had contraction; it has done its worst and its utmost. It only remains to seize the opportunity which is offered to us and to reap the benefits which we would not take any steps to bring about.

One thing, however, should be distinctly borne in mind. The present situation calls for only two kinds of measures—one looking to the gradual and easy reduction of the legal-tender notes, which can be effected by funding; the other the gradual strengthening of the coin reserves of the Government and the banks with reference to maintaining the value of our paper at a level with that of coin. It does not call for any action with reference to silver in any form or for any purpose. The action of economic forces which cannot be resisted has made our paper nearly equal to gold. If we choose, we can make it wholly equal, and can keep it so. But this is a matter with which the various phases of the silver question have no connection whatever. We may believe what we will about the virtues of the "double standard," or about the advisability of restoring a silver legal tender. It is plain that we do not need a silver legal tender to enable us to reach the redemption of our notes, and that any complication with regard to such a measure would only bring confusion and injury to business. Paper has approached as near as it now is to par in gold without any help from any of the schemes for remonetizing silver, and whether that metal is or is not to be used again by civilized commercial nations is a question of the remote future. As far as our own immediate exigency goes, it is a question of lunar politics. We notice with regret that the President introduces this matter indirectly in his Message by stating his estimate of the total increase of silver as well as of gold as one of the grounds for his suggestions, and by a wholly irrelevant and unsupported recommendation for the repeal of the limitation on subsidiary coinage. These suggestions need not be considered in the present emergency. The clear, emphatic question now forced on Congress is this: The discount on our notes is very small. Shall it be wholly wiped out by funding the surplus notes or not? That simple demand answered rightly, everything else will follow.

A WISE MEASURE.

We wish that there were some ground for hoping that the altogether admirable bill "to reform the civil service of the United States," introduced in Congress the other day by Mr. Rice, might become a law. It was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and will doubtless sleep the sleep that knows no waking. But it is so admirably and clearly drawn, and shows so thorough a comprehension of the evils that infest the service, and of the proper remedy for them, that we cannot refrain from calling public attention to it. Mr. Rice is, we believe, a Democrat, but no Republican need for that reason fear to support the wise and temperate measure which he has introduced. We do not know whether Mr. Rice is the author of the bill, or whether it has been merely submitted by him at the request of some other, but, whoever the author, it is plain that he has given earnest thought and study to the solution of the problem of civil service reform.

The preamble of the bill recites in forcible language the evils to be corrected. The words will bear quotation in full:

"The various departments of the civil service of the United States are suffering loss and injury from the appointment of incompetent and unfaithful employes, and also from the temporary and uncertain tenure of office which now prevails, by which valuable, experienced, and reliable public servants are suddenly dismissed without cause, and ignorant and incompetent persons appointed from merely political motives, to the detriment and ruin of the public service. Men of steady habits, prudence, and experience are discouraged from making the civil service a profession, because of its uncertainty, and are compelled to regard it merely as a temporary resource, to be abandoned at the first opportunity of obtaining more reliable engagements. This uncertainty of the tenure of office, and the constant liability to sudden and insulting dismissal without cause, have a direct tendency to destroy all self-respect on the part of employes, and to discourage honesty and faithfulness in the discharge of their most important duties, when placed in positions of responsibility and public trust."

We have not often seen a more complete and truthful picture of the enormities of the spoils system than this. It is an encouraging sign that even one member of Congress has so clear a conception of evils to which most of his brethren resolutely shut their eyes.

The remedy proposed is quite as excellent as the diagnosis of the disease. The bill provides for the appointment by the President, subject to confirmation by the Senate, of five persons, "eminent for learning, ability, and character," to constitute a Board of Examiners to examine all candidates for admission into or promotion within the civil service of the United States, and to hold office during good behavior and efficiency. They are to hold examinations, after due advertisement, at least four times a year in Washington, and annually in six of the most populous cities of the Union situated so as to be conveniently reached by citizens of all sections. All citizens of the United States of good moral character are to be permitted to compete in the examinations on equal terms. The subjects prescribed for the examinations for entrance to the service are reading, writing, spelling, arithmetic, English grammar, geography, American history, and elementary drawing; not a very formidable catalogue, certainly, but sufficient to test the qualifications required for the minor positions. The successful candidates are to receive certificates of fitness for the probationary class of clerkships, or other primary employments in the civil service, at a salary of not more than $75 a month, and their names are to be placed on approved lists, from which appointments are to be made from time to time in the order of merit. Persons so appointed are not to be eligible for promotion until after four years of faithful service, when they shall be advanced to clerkships at salaries of $100 a month, and for every five additional years of faithful service their salaries shall be increased 10 per centum, until they reach $150 per month. All promotions are to be based upon public competitive examinations, and are to be made one grade at a time. Special examinations are to be held for both entrance and promotion whenever required. All examinations are to be duly advertised, and "to be open to the public, and conducted in a spirit of fairness and strict impartiality, without political bias or personal favor or affection." The provisions of the act are to apply to all positions in the civil service, of whatever nature, throughout the United States, the salaries of which are more than $60 and not more than $150 a month. A further excellent provision is that all civil servants may be retired on half-pay, after ten years of faithful service, on reaching the age of 70. In brief, the whole spirit of the measure is to elevate the civil service to the dignity of an honorable, independent profession, the members of which shall be capable and self-respecting men, and not the mere creatures and toadies of politicians.

Such is a meagre outline of what we believe to be an eminently wise, fair, feasible, and necessary measure. The only criticism which we have to make upon it is that its scope is too limited. It should be so extended as to take in all grades of officers below those who shape the policy of the Government, and who should therefore be in sympathy with the party in power. We have called attention to its provisions because we believe that, in the event of the inauguration of Gov. Hayes, such a law will be, if not indispensable, at least highly helpful to him and his Administration in carrying out the policy of reform to which he is pledged both by the platform of his party and by his own voluntary assurances. We regard it as necessary to the success of that policy that the new Administration shall be equipped at the very outset with the means of resisting the torrent of selfish influences which will be directed against it. There must be no temporizing with the corrupters of the civil service and the enemies of its reformation, but they must be made to understand, from the very hour that the President assumes his office, that the days of their power for evil are at an end. If he can be aided by legislation, it will be a great help; if not, he must fight the good fight armed only with the weapons which the Constitution places in his hands.

LEGISLATIVE ENCROACHMENTS.

"Parliament," says Thomas Erskine May, in his Constitutional History of England, "has no direct control over any single department of the State." According to the accepted theories of a majority of our rulers at Washington, the American doctrine is that Congress has direct control over every department of the State. It has proceeded at length, by virtue of the omnipotence of its legislative will, to absorb all the powers of government.

It has reached in the process of unification of power, the concentration of all power in one set of men, or Congressional centre. This practically omnipotent Legislature has appointed ten of its members, each one of whom is prohibited as an officer of the United States from voting directly for a President, to decide, virtually without appeal, who shall constitute the executive head of the nation, thereby controlling, through ten legislators, the Executive Department of the Government for four years. It has taken five Judges of the Supreme Court, each also constitutionally disqualified to vote as an Elector for President, to aid in selecting the Executive, thereby disabling the highest court from passing judgment upon the constitutionality of its own unwarranted legislative act. Having silenced the Judicial Department by taking a majority of the Justices from the bench of the supreme tribunal, and placing in their hands the joint and several powers and duties of all the members of Congress and all the Presidential Electors, this unchecked Legislative Department, with a coolness that is unapproachable, strips the second highest officer in the Executive Department of his powers and prerogatives, without leave or license, having first rendered an appeal on his part from the unconstitutionality of their legislation useless and without possible result.

It has heretofore been supposed that the authority of the American Congress was extremely limited compared with that of the British Parliament. Since this last feat of legislative legerdemain, the received opinion must be reversed, and Parliament must be deemed a body of restricted powers compared with Congress. The former has not yet been able to virtually muzzle the Judiciary of England, or to determine, without popular approval, who should be the executive head and personal representative of the sovereignty of the United Kingdom. Our Congress finds no difficulty in making whom it pleases the Executive, nor in disposing of the pretensions of the Judiciary Department to sit in judgment upon its acts, or judge of the validity of its proceedings while creating for the people an Executive.

This is a superlative stretch of power, it must be conceded, yet it is but a small part of what the lower half of the present extraordinary Congress has assumed or attempted. Assuming that it carries the weighty responsibilities of the three great departments of the Government of the United States upon its shoulders, it has commanded Cabinet Ministers and the principal officers of the Executive Department to make known to it under oath the mode and manner in which they have severally discharged their executive duties.

This retiring House has modestly requested the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy to inform it what reasons or what business he had to send a company of artillery or regiment of infantry to one part of the country rather than to another. The airiness of this request will be appreciated when it is remembered that if the President of the United States sees fit to order every soldier in the Army and every vessel in the Navy to Eastport, Maine, or to Galveston, Texas that is his own affair, and strictly within the scope of his authority. This meddlesome House has arrested and imprisoned in the common jail private citizens for refusing to reveal the contents of their ledgers and secrets of their private business. It has dragged across the continent citizens and officers of distant States, deprived them of their liberty, and treated them with contumely, because they would not produce before a sub-committee of the House books and papers used in the discharge of a State duty, which official record had actually and legally passed out of their control and possession. It has ransacked and rifled telegraph offices in the maintenance of the monstrous doctrine that no citizen has a secret so sacred that it cannot be given by the House to the whole world. Its committees have compelled telegraph operators, who perform their duties under solemn oaths of secrecy, to violate their oaths, thus, while acting as law-makers, being guilty of the crime of the subornation of perjury. Not content with suborning witnesses, this House has encouraged its committees to make indecent assaults upon the public and private characters of all citizens who stand in its way to power, and have put forward the advocate and defender of an infamous public thief to bully and insult honorable men who testify against either this brazen attorney's convicted client or the one not yet brought to trial and justice.

Whether such a House should enlarge its jurisdiction so as to permanently possess the power of appointing not only the Presidential Electors and the President, but the Chief Justice and other State and national officers, or whether it should limit its range to legitimate legislation, it is not difficult to determine. In fact the people have already decided this question by changing the political and personal character of its membership and consigning, by their votes, some of its most expansive statesmen to the narrow jurisdiction of a political grave.

IS THE EUROPEAN CONFERENCE A FAILURE?

There seems no doubt that the Russian volunteers have had orders from St. Petersburg to leave Servia, and that this Principality is inclining to separate negotiations with Turkey to close the war so far as her own participation is concerned. Russia herself appears occupied in gaining time, and is reported to have already made propositions for further conferences of the European powers, and for other negotiations with the Sublime Porte. Turkey has shown a remarkable firmness in the deliberations of the conference, and something of the old dignity of a conquering race. Even in her weakness and dotage, she has declined all propositions which looked toward infringing on her imperial power with almost as much pride as Othman or Amurath might have exhibited. As though her European provinces had not been for generations a by-word for misrule, oppression, and misery, she has haughtily refused the three various suggestions of the conference—of their police control by an international gendarmerie, by a Russian Army, or by native troops under European direction.

The offer of introducing modern European reforms has been triumphantly met by the production of the new Constitution of December, which is (on paper) all that the most liberal could demand. Any suggestions in regard to taxation or equal representation of Christians and Mohammedans in courts of justice or provincial assemblies are diplomatically answered by this same nominally liberal reform. In fact, if this is all of the conference, Turkey has merely put out another iradé or Constitution, which will be like the several before, and has retained her position in her own provinces, leaving the "Eastern question" very much as it was before. In many points of view, it might be called a diplomatic victory for the Turks. But it must be borne in mind that the main objects of the Russians may have been to put themselves in the right before the European powers, to insure their neutrality in case of war, and to gain time. Besides, it could never be known beforehand how far the Turks might yield to the demands or wishes of united Europe.

If the firmness of the Sultan has been unexpected, it must be because the Turkish character and history are not known. The house of Othman has the pride of perhaps the oldest family of Kings in Europe, and it is a race which, however effeminate, has never been cowardly. It has known how to conquer, and, though miserably changed from that hardy chieftain who entered Europe in 1389, it has been one of those soldierly races qui savent mourir—who know how to die. As it entered Europe with fire and sword, so it would choose to leave its old possessions—not peacefully, under diplomatic impulse. One important fact appears developed by the conference, that a secret bond or alliance holds the Empires of Germany and Russia. The influence of Von Bismarck has been decidedly thrown in favor of Gen. Ignatieff, and toward a strong demand of Europe upon Turkey to submit to Muscovite demands.

The French press explain this characteristically by the amiable supposition that Bismarck wishes to exhaust Russia's resources or draw away her attention, so that her alliance might not be offered to France when the next German invasion shall come. We may more rationally suppose that the Prussian Chancellor prefers to establish that relation between the two Empires which will secure the rear of Germany, in case of the always-expected collision with France.

What is precisely Russia's policy now is somewhat difficult to determine. There are always two elements of the problem to consider—the peaceful sentiments of the Czar, and the war passion of the people. Then, as war approaches, come in all the disasters to business and the hardships of mobilization and filling up of regiments. The thirst for the conflict may well be somewhat slaked now, and yet the desire burst forth later. So far as one can judge from the traditions of Russia or any other military despotism, the Emperor could not retain his crown a month, if it were discovered by the people that when the emergency came for which all this military administration existed, it had failed and Russia was beaten without a battle. Such Empires live on prestige. To brave their old enemies the Turks and make this grand preparation all for nothing would create a disturbance and discontent in Russia itself, which might well shake the Empire to its foundations. A few weeks will determine whether the Czar is waiting for Spring to open the military campaign, or whether he proposes only a war of diplomacy.

OUR DESERTED VILLAGES.

A short time since a correspondent of a Western paper, in speaking of the predicted extermination of the old Puritan element in this country, called attention to a curious and melancholy instance of this change. This was that in a small town on the coast of Maine, of some eight or nine hundred inhabitants, there was not a single person residing who lived there fifty years ago, nor even a solitary descendant of those dwelling in the town at that period, although it then had even more inhabitants than it has to-day. As the name of this ill-fated township was not given, we are, unfortunately, not able to verify the statement; but whether it is exaggerated or not, it is merely a strongly-drawn illustration of a well-authenticated course of events that has slowly changed the character of the population in several of our New-England States. It is open to any one to offset this by pointing to what might be termed the Newer-England, which is to be found in the Valley of the Mississippi, or west of the Rocky Mountains; but we have no intention of elaborating theories as to the decadence or emigration of races; our intention is merely to note a few of the minor features of this change, which we strongly believe is fast becoming a thing of the past.

Half a century ago there were numerous small seaports scattered along the coast-line of Maine, New-Hampshire, and Massachusetts, which were, in their way, important commercial centres. Though the ancient maritime fame of such places as Nantucket and Salem still lingers in memory, that of smaller towns is forgotten, although they were interested in foreign trade to an extent which now seems hardly possible. Vessels were built there and sent to the East Indies and South America, and not infrequently brought their return cargoes direct to the home port, instead of going to New-York, or possibly to Boston, as would now be the case. This gave to these places a business standing out of all proportion to their size or wealth, and also, we may add, gave to the social life a certain tone which seems to be inseparable from travel and varied experience. The necessity of manning the vessels furnished employment to all the young men who cared to become sailors, and this, as we have said above, brought them back to their homes at stated intervals. The concentration of the shipping trade has changed all this. Vessels are now built at these places, and may sometimes be seen in the docks of this City, bearing the name of their birthplace; but the title is purely visionary, for they never again see their home port after their keels have once left its waters. The young men who would formerly have found employment in the various warehouses, or on the ships, have been forced to look elsewhere for support, and as a rule have sought it somewhere in the Western States. It is this that has given to many of these towns a death-in-life appearance somewhat analogous to that of abandoned mining villages in Nevada and California; but if, as is often the case, the place has been selected by some manufacturing corporation as a site for their works, the elimination of the original inhabitants has soon followed, for an inroad of French Canadian and Irish settlers does not add to the attractiveness of any place of residence.

Perhaps the chief misfortune in these business transitions has been the rupture of those home and family ties that give strength and character to all communities, great or small. It is absurd to suppose that people can dwell contentedly in a place where there exists an extreme disparity in the number of the sexes, and in times past this has been found to an astonishing extent in scores of the small towns on the coast of Maine, or among the hills of New-Hampshire. The young men who left these places, like the wandering Israelites, found wives for themselves among the Philistines; and the dull monotony of a life that seemed almost purposeless made any change appear a desirable one to the young women who were left behind. More than this, they were stimulated to seek something different from what they knew by minds excited by the fanciful successes of serial heroines. It is not our intention to push this further, but it may not be out of place to state that the conclusions that would naturally be drawn from such a condition of affairs are in this instance correct. The towns of New-Hampshire abandoned by agriculture, and those of Maine deserted by commerce, have for the past twenty-five years, according to the Police statistics of Philadelphia, Boston, and this City, furnished a largely disproportionate quota of instances of female depravity. Indeed, it could hardly be otherwise, when account is taken of the immense number of young women who during this period have left their homes in these two States.

Unquestionably this is an evil which time will correct, and already the worst is over; for in revolutions, either of trade or politics, the ruin and distress created is, for the time being, more apparent than the advantages gained. Most of the New-England towns have, by freeing themselves of their surplus of population, adjusted themselves to suit the new order of things; and each is now striving to become a manufacturing centre. The tide of emigration which during the lives of two generations has carried hundreds of thousands of New-Englanders to the South and West has to a considerable degree abated, and is not likely again to exercise so strong an influence for some years to come.

A PLEA FOR BIGAMY.

The apologists for the great prophet, Joseph Smith, and the denouncers of his business manager, Brigham Young, maintain that polygamy did not enter into the calculations of the Mormon fathers. That patriarchal institution they aver to have gradually arisen under the stress of the naughty desires and through the unbounded powers of the elders of the Church. Wandering Englishmen of a soft-headed variety, and a nature prone to exaggerate the attractions of a multiplicity of wives, seldom fail to visit the great Brigham in his seraglio, and, after being duly impressed with the force of his vulgarity, to astonish the natives of London by their liberal admiration for the Emperor of Mormondom. But they do not perceive that Brigham is shrewdly taking advantage of their want of penetration. "Look at me," says Brigham; "here I am with so many wives and so many children, and we are all a happy family; no fuss, no fighting among us." Is it to be wondered at that the addle-pated Lord should rush home and applaud the Turks for one more domestic virtue which they share with Mormons—the Biblical system of polygamy?

Travelers in Utah have missed, it is only too apparent, the real distinction which separates Brigham Young from the ranks of reformers, which degrades him from the position of a statesman (where addle-pates would have him) to the comparatively unimportant status of an animal. Had Brigham seen fit to draw the line at number two, he would have headed the list of benefactors of his race; since he failed to be satisfied with a brace of wives, his memory, so long as it may survive, will only excite contempt. Should any persons ask why there is this gulf fixed between the numbers two and three when it comes to wives, the answer is that they have never allowed their imaginations to rove fondly on the pleasures and exemptions to be found in the life of a bigamist. If they had examined the Mormon question carefully, they ought to have perceived that all the harmony and domestic peace attributed by Brigham to polygamy applies equally well to bigamy, whence the stern deductions of logic at once draw the conclusion that all beyond bigamy is mere wickedness, and not a striving after that ideal family life which the sin-scarred prophet would have us believe.

For on what grounds does the polygamist explain the quiet of his home? Manifestly—whenever he cares to be a truthful polygamist—on the ground that one wife counteracts the other, holds the other in check. The favorite herself has to beware; for those who are not favorites may become so on the slightest tripping up of her influence over the patriarch. Therefore, though her fingers yearn ever so vindictively for the solid tomato-can, and her nails long to furrow the placid spaces of her patriarch's face, yet must she restrain herself and smile and smile and be a favorite. But no English Lord has yet exposed to Brigham Young and the world that the same line of argument would apply to bigamy, and that a third wife is a superfluous expense.

When one comes to regard this question in the broader light of American history, the want of statesmanship of Brigham Young can only be paralleled by the grossness of his tastes. Had he not the Constitution of the United States before him as a model, and could he not have imitated that most perfect instrument of our modern civilization? Everybody agrees that the State is founded on the family. Heretofore there have been Kings who commanded and enjoyed like husbands, and nations who obeyed and were chastised like wives. But the modern Republic changed all that. The President may be ruler and husband, but he no longer has the nation for a wife and slave. The nation now appears as two wives in the shape of Senate and House of Representatives. At first blush it appears that these two are meant to limit and circumscribe his authority. They do so in many ways, but he is amply revenged by the freedom they are forced to allow him. For while they are fighting or regarding each other through the mist of a hollow truce, he goes off to Long Branch and has a good time. "Just here" Brigham Young failed to apply the lesson of the Constitution to his family life. Had he been content with being a consistent bigamist, he would not only have lived the happy father of a comparatively rational number of children, but he would have succeeded in attracting the major part of the aristocracy of England to exchange the gilded halls of luxury and one wife for the homely delights of Utah and two evenly-balanced spouses each.

GROWTH OF THE EARTH.

A London newspaper says: "In the interesting course of lectures on astronomy which Mr. R. A. Proctor has been delivering in the theatre of the Society of Arts, for the especial benefit of young persons, his subject last evening was 'Meteors, Comets, and Stars.' In speaking of meteors, he developed at some length the thought, which will strike many as a novelty, that the earth is, has always been, and so long as it shall exist as a part of our cosmical system must ever continue to be, growing in size. Meteors are bodies, composed of extra-terrene matter, which travel in vast belts and in highly eccentric orbits round the sun. These belts, or systems of meteors, are very numerous, and when their orbits intersect that of the earth they are brought within the influence of its gravitation, and on entering our atmosphere become luminous and fall to the surface of our planet in those periodical showers of shooting stars which are so well known. Not a night passes in which some falling stars are not seen, and in certain months and on particular nights the golden rain is incessant. Of course, too, meteors fall in the daytime, although unseen. It is computed, said the lecturer, that hundreds of thousands of these extra-terrene bodies become incorporated with the earth every 24 hours, and 400,000,000 in the course of each year. They may vary in weight between a few grains and a ton. One is known to have fallen in South America which weighed 15 tons. Yet these small accretions to the earth's matter would take many millions of years to add a single foot to its diameter. It had been shown that one of these meteoric systems followed in the track of a small telescopic comet, although not to be confounded with its tail, and it was now the general opinion of astronomers that all these belts of meteors were similarly related to comets. Mr. Proctor then proceeded to speak of comets and stars."

A CARD FROM MR. CLEWS.

The statement referring to my late firm which appeared in your columns yesterday was entirely ex parte and not in accordance with the facts in the case. Hennequin & Co. have no claim whatever. They were settled with in full several years since. HENRY CLEWS

GLIMPSES OF THE PRESENT AND THE PAST.

WASHINGTON, Tuesday, Jan. 30, 1877.

I heard every word of Mr. Conkling's eight-hour speech on the Joint Commission plan—one great argument given in two installments—and though I feel more and more that life is too short for such things, I am not sorry that I have heard all that could be said on that side of the question—have seen all the reasons and precedents skillfully and powerfully, if not persuasively, put. Notwithstanding the length of his effort, not only Mr. Conkling's associates but his late opponents paid him the compliment of a close attention throughout. More than one Democratic countenance glowed with generous admiration. I noticed that Mr. Bogy seemed ready to exclaim, "A Daniel come to judgment; yea, a Daniel;" and when he was most eloquent and impressive I saw Mr. Thurman glance from the speaker to Senators Cameron, Morton, Sherman, and Sargent with an expression that reminded me of Timon's indorsement of Alcibiades.

I was also reminded on that day of a scene in the old Senate chamber, which, one hot Summer morning, was packed to its utmost capacity, by as eager a crowd, assembled to hear Mr. Webster in his last solemn utterances in favor of the compromise measures of 1850. Near Mr. Conkling sat a man who, from a seat similarly situated, listened to and watched with restless, gleaming eyes the great expounder on that memorable occasion—Henry S. Foote. The snows of 77 Winters show in his hair, and have doubtless cooled his hot head, but he is marvelously alert still; interested in and enjoying everything as it comes. Age has only iced the champagne of life for him. Among all that "cloud of witnesses" there was but one other—honest, steadfast Hannibal Hamlin—who, to my knowledge, had beheld that other compromise struggle and shared in the conflict. Then, as now, the Republic was in deadly peril. Then, as now, a patriotic contrivance was said to have saved it. It gives me a melancholy, or what is the same thing for a woman, a venerable, feeling, to remember how many times I have seen the Republic lost through corruption and retrieved through compromise. Liberty also I have often and often beheld quite o'erthrown. But she always comes up livelier than ever—seems to thrive on falls—is a sort of female Antæus. In that time, as in this, commerce and trade made a great outside pressure. Both the merchant and the Jew came into court, and there was a charge of yard-sticks on the enemies of compromise. Mr. Morton rowed stoutly against the heavy seas of opposition and the stiff headwinds of fame, but the boat was scuttled. Mr. Sherman, Mr. Sargent, and Mr. Blaine were able to do little more than put themselves eloquently on record as good men and true, fearless and independent. Mr. Cameron, the Nestor of the Senate, in his brief, terse, speech was most impressive. I hope the party he has so long served may not see his predictions fulfilled and know, when too late, that

Speaking of sunsets, among the spectators who came in from the House to see the vote taken, I noticed Mr. S. S. Cox, whose face wears perhaps a more expectatious, but hardly a more vivacious, look than of old. He has been the Mark Tapley of the Democracy through all its dark days. A wit in the House is a well-spring of jollity, whichever side he jokes on, and if worst comes to worst, and Mr. Hayes is counted out, I hope I shall be a good Christian enough to rejoice with the Coxes who do rejoice, as well as to weep with the Garfields who weep.

I heard only the few last hours of the debate in the House. Shortly after I entered the reporters' gallery, where, all other places being filled, I was graciously accorded a seat, the management settled on the time for taking the vote and the momentous moment was announced. It was kind of them to make this proclamation that the undecided should hurry up to a decision; but it reminded me of an old classic story: A famous Greek cynic, that same Timon of Athens, once ascended the tribune and amid the breathless silence of curious and eager expectation, said: "Athenians, I have a small field, and in this field a fig-tree, on which many citizens have already hanged themselves. I intend now to build a house on this spot, and I wish to give you notice before I begin, in order that if there be any more of you who intend to hang yourselves, you may come before the fig-tree is cut down."

I was especially delighted by a pluckv, pithy, pointed, genuinely witty speech, by old Martin I. Townsend, of Troy, a man who reminds me somewhat of Joshua R. Giddings. His best hits were a characterization of Mr. Watterson as the "Marat of our Constituent Assembly," and of the then unknown Ben Hodges as the Colossus of Rhodes, spanning the great gulf between the two parties." Soon after the veteran came Mr. Field, with his maiden speech—a trim, dainty little maiden, from the neat chaussure of a modest exordium to the pretty top-knot of a poetic peroration. I was pained to miss from his seat Alexander H. Stephens, in the dying embers of whose genius glows more vital heat than flashes and crackles in the brief bonfires of all the young orators about him. One of these, who is accounted very eloquent, and doubtless is so at times, J. Young Brown, spoke like a very young Brown, I thought, indulging in fantaronade more or less. "One month ago," he said, "I despaired of the Republic." I remember feeling mysteriously depressed about that time myself. It may be Brown's despair was in the air and I had an attack of it. But look it for dyspepsia. I did not hear Ben. Hill, but I heard Tom Jones, Frank Hurd, and lots of the other boys, all speaking their little pieces in the midst of ever-increasing noise and confusion. It was in vain the Speaker exhorted, appealed and threatened—the tumult was arrested for a moment, only to gather new force. Voices of the Democratic crowd in the rear of the seats kept up a multitudinous murmur which almost amounted to a roar. It was gavel against gabble.

The galleries and even the door-ways were packed with spectaters—many of them young girls, who even in these fast and forward times, could by no possibility have understood the bewildering questions and momentous issues in debate, but who evidently enjoyed in a confused way, the excitement and turmoil below. It was a mild form of gladiatorial show, an æsthetic bull-fight, for them. As I looked over the vast assembly, and down into that pit of agitated humanity, all confused movement and hurry, like a big ant-hill through which a furrow has been run, the thought which always comes to me in a crowd, smote upon my heart. Where will we all be 50 years hence? "What is life that we should fret? Why make we such ado?" Instantly the great uproar was wrapped in a greater silence—tier after tier of faces in the long galleries seemed to disappear in funereal shadows, while the floor below seemed paved with memorial slabs and honeycombed with graves, to paraphrase an eminent Senator. It may be that that little portion of probation, that impercceptible point on the great dial-plate of time—half a century—will be allowed to none of us: that some stormy night God may forget us, as we deserve to be forgotten; that the supports of his laws may give way under the circular track of our blindly-rushing world, and we go plunging down into wild abysses of flood and flame, terror and dire destruction. Or, in some celestial collision, our sun may be quite put out, and a tidal wave of unimagined cold whelm our round earth in the twinkling of an eye and freeze us all in our tracks—rolling or trading, dancing or debating. A frozen flag would float above a silent Capitol till the four winds of a darkened heaven should divide it; the frozen arm of the Speaker would hold a gavel forever uplifted; the frigid lips of the orator would refuse even to ask permission to have the arrested speech published in the Record; limp knees and hot brains, the liquefied and oozing scourge of Republicanism and "the shoreless fire-lava of Democracy" would alike stiffen into adamantine ice, and a congealed Congress would remain in horrible, but harmless, session till the crack of doom should announce the great thaw of the dies iræ and the final adjournment.

Speaking of Egyptian darkness and hyperborean cold, destruction, and judgment, when I face the fact of the possibility of the defeat of our side—of the Democracy sailing in between the legs of Mr. Townsend's Colossus, and proceeding, like Wierd Sister No. 1, to "do, and do, and do," I ask myself, will the disaster ruin or rally the Republican Party? Certainly, if that organization have in it even "a little leaven" of the grand old principles on which it was founded, it will rise again. There is too much bluster, threatening, and bravado about modern Democracy, as represented in Congress at least, for it to triumph long, for the day for such things is past. It has still clever and courageous leaders, it has its old crafty and ruse policy; its vital principles have not been all compromised, but its elements are more incongruous and rebellious than of old; it lacks the old discipline; it is more of the nature of a mob, and, as Emerson says, "a mob cannot be a permanency." He says also that "foolish legislation is a rope of sand, that perishes in the twisting." If the mooning party does wickedly, or unwisely—and its wickedness and unwisdom must be very pronounced to exceed that of the out-goers—its lease of power will probably be brief, and the younger party—child of freedom and justice, born in a troublous but glorious time, receiving a dreadful baptism of heroic blood, but growing up somewhat too proud and overbearing, and disposed to squander its rich inheritance on miscreants and mercenaries—will come back, chastened by tribulation, taught in the stern school of adversity, and prepared to run a nobler and a happier career.

In the House that day, as in the Senate the day before, there was an appearance of beautiful accord, any amount of "peace and goodwill," between the Democratic and Republican advocates of the great Millennial Measure. The newly-elected Senatorial lion of Georgia seemed disposed to snuggle down by the newly-elected Senatorial lamb of Massachusetts. They were all ready and eager to sacrifice their prejudices and even their scruples to tranquillity and brotherly unity. They sank the partisan in the patriot. Under that name, "too often profaned," they were content to be comprised and compromised together. The Democrats now speak of the measure as "a mutual concession," a little leaning to the Hayes side, "but fair upon the whole." Apropos of this, I heard last night a little story, which I hope will not prove ancient to your readers, as an illustration: An honest old Georgia negro on his way home from market, where he had been to sell chickens, and where he had sold all of his lot except one, encountered a shrewd white acquaintance, who, looking on the chicken, and finding it goodly, coolly proposed to the owner to put it up on the board for a game of euchre. The owner being a guileless and pious African—"hoping all things, believing all things"—assented. They had a small game and the black man lost. As he took the stake, a fine fat pullet, rather reluctantly from his basket and handed it over to the winner, the latter cheerily remarked: "it was a fair game, you know, Uncle." "O yes, Sar, I 'spect it was," replied the bewildered loser, scratching his head, "a far game—but den, 'pears to me you didn't put nothin' up agin dat dar chicken."

AMUSEMENTS.

LOCAL AFFAIRS.

"The Danichetts" will be brought out at the Union Square Theatre to-night.

A novel programme will be offered by Mr. Heller at his Wonder Theatre this evening.

"Marton, la Jolie Bouquetière" is to be the attraction at Wood's Museum this evening.

Mr. Rowe's new play, called "Fifth Avenue," is to be produced this evening at Booth's Theatre.

NOTES FROM ABROAD.

The Abbé Colin, Hon. Canon of St. Brieuc, and a well-known patron of music and the arts, is dead.

Nearly 17,000 francs was collected for the benefit of M. Laurent, late of the Paris Opéra Comique.

The composer Victor Jonsières has been made an officer, and Léo Delibès a Knight of the Legion of Honor.

A new drama, called "The Queen of Connaught," has been produced, with partial success only, at the Olympic Theatre in London.

Since the Berlin opera opened for the season, on Sept. 1, to the end of the year, 95 performances of 38 works by 22 composers were given. Two of these works were novelties.

M. Vizentini, father of the Director of the Paris Théâtre Lyrique, was to have a farewell benefit at that theatre. He has been 45 years a member of the theatrical profession.

The new opera by the Russian composer, Tchaikowski, called "Vakoul, the Blacksmith," has been produced with signal success at the St. Petersburg Theatre Maria. The libretto is based on a novel by Nicolas Gogol.

Mlle. Dica-Petit, who recently poisoned herself by accident, continues in a very precarious condition, and although no immediate danger was anticipated, it was thought she would not be able to make her rentrée at the Odéon for some considerable time.

Signor Verdi has contributed £20 toward the fund now being raised in Vienna for the erection of a monument to Beethoven. A concert is to be given in Milan to aid the subscription. The first attempt to recognize the genius of Beethoven after his death was made in London by the late Earl of Westmoreland, the founder of the Royal Academy of Music, who got up a concert in Drury Lane Theatre. It was, however, Dr. Liszt who made such a large sacrifice of time and money for the festival at Bonn, where the statue of Beethoven was erected.

An opera by Signor Lauro Rossi, called "Biorn," and founded as to its story upon "Macbeth"—the venue, however, being transferred to Norway—has been brought out at the Queen's Theatre in London. The Athenæum says: "Signor Rossi's score is not at all difficult to analyze, for it is utterly unpretentious. It is quite free from intricacy; it has no subtle meaning; it individualizes no character; it is neither uncouth nor ugly; it is not learned, much less severe; it is, in fact, an opera of the purely modern school, full of tune from beginning to end, and can be converted into exhilarating quadrilles and waltzes for the ball-room, while it will supply some charming airs for the concert halls and for the drawing-room. There were all the elements for a success for 'Biorn,' had the cast of the principals, with the honorable exceptions referred to, been up to the mark."

THE WEATHER.

LYNCHERS FOILED.

A telegram from Marlin, Texas, Jan. 30, to the Galveston News, says: "Last night after midnight about 40 masked men, mounted and armed, surrounded the jail for the purpose of taking out one or more prisoners, whether to lynch or rescue them is not certainly known, but it was probably to lynch. The jailers promptly gave the alarm, and officers and citizens came to their support with pistols and shot-guns. A few unarmed citizens talked with the mob, strongly urging them to desist from their violent purpose. Deputy Sheriff Sam A. Read took his stand in front of the jail door, and told them plainly that the first man who undertook to break the door would be shot, be the consequences what they might. The firm and gallant conduct of Deputy Sheriff Read, backed by Jailers J. M. Jolly and N. D. Pruden, City Marshal Gammill, and a number of spirited citizens so impressed the mob that, after various threatening demonstrations continuing more than an hour, they withdrew."

BREAD ON THE WATERS.

The Meriden (Conn.) Republican says that John C. Chapman, of New-Haven, who has been accustomed to supply postage stamps to letters mailed in that city without them is not to go unrewarded. An unknown person of Boston, who has been benefited, has sent him a painting of a ship of the line under full canvas, the work of John Loos of Antwerp.

NEW IMPLEMENTS OF WAR.

THE SCIENCE OF DESTRUCTION.

GUN-COTTON AS AN EXPLOSIVE FORCE—ITALIAN EXPERIMENTS—AN IMMENSE CANNON TO BE BUILT IN ENGLAND—MOUNTED PIONEERS IN THE BRITISH CAVALRY.

From Our Military Correspondent.

LONDON, Friday, Jan. 19, 1877.

Many people have argued from purely humane feelings that the greater the powers of destruction of our warlike implements the greater will be the chance of a speedy conclusion to wars themselves and of the maintenance of peace generally. Such humanitarians should rejoice at the prospect of the wholesale butchery of our fellow-creatures which future conflicts between the greater powers promise to entail, that is, if the new weapons are attended with the success predicted. Many persons may recollect the abhorrence manifested by the world at large for the offer made by the late Lord Dundonald, to reduce the fortresses of Cronstadt and Sevastopol without loss of life to the besiegers. As his noble and truly humane offer was not accepted, his secret died with him, but it is supposed to have consisted in striking down the garrison by means of noxious gases introduced by some novel method of his own. It is doubtful, however, whether the cold-blooded means devised for the speedy reduction of garrisons could be regarded by practical men as being more devoid of chivalric and humane feelings than the use of weapons which, when brought to bear upon floating, and to all appearance impregnable, fortresses garrisoned with perhaps 700 or 800 men, can send the whole to the bottom of the sea within five minutes. This, the latest triumph as a depopulator—the 100-ton gun at Spezzia, Italy—has fully proved its power to effect. No vessel now afloat could withstand this weapon at even 1,000 yards' range, and in the trials which have recently taken place, it has not only demonstrated that we have no vessels at present to cope with it, but also that the adopted method of construction is radically wrong.

It is well known that most armor-plated ships are constructed upon what is known as the sandwich system—that is, the side of the vessel represents alternate layers of iron and wood, (oak or teak;) but the experiments under the supervision of the Italian artillerists have proved the fallacy of this method of resistance. With a charge of 350 pounds, when firing against a target composed of two iron plates of 12 inches and 10 inches thick respectively, separated by 12 inches of teak, the penetration of the projectile (a solid shot) extended through the 12-inch plate, the teak backing, and 7 inches of the second plate; but when turned against a target composed of 22 inches of solid iron, it did not penetrate above 15 inches in all, and no serious bulge was found on the interior side of the plate. With a powder-charge increased to 349 pounds of Fossano powder, the 2,000-pound projectile pierced the 22-inch solid iron target and showed a considerable amount of surplus energy to spare.

The Italians have partially succeeded in adapting gun-cotton as a bursting charge for shells, and should the success of the experiments be assured—that is, an immunity from premature explosions be perfectly provided against—they will obtain the credit of having succeeded where the expensive experimental branch in this country has failed. As an explosive, gun-cotton will be considerably cheaper than gunpowder, and its destructive power infinitely superior. From its violent explosive action, it is better adapted for a bursting charge than when the combustion is gradual, as in gunpowder, and what is known as a "common shell" would be rendered a more destructive missile, under certain conditions, than either a shrapnel or segment.

The experiments in this country with the 80-ton gun are not yet completed, the final stage being arranged for next week, when the ponderous target of 32 inches of iron and 15 inches of teak will be fired at. The fissure in the steel tube, which was recently discovered after firing, is attributed to the strain produced by using a charge of 370 pounds, instead of 350 pounds, as first contemplated, and also to the reduction in strength caused by the enlargement of the bore from 16 inches to 18 inches. Many rounds could still be fired before the gun became useless. A tolerably satisfactory trial to test the destructive power of shrapnel shell against wooden vessels has been made with this gun, the only drawback to complete success being the action of the percussion fuse. Such a perfect adjustment of the detonation is required that the few rounds which have been fired with these large shell have not been sufficient to enable the Explosives Committee to determine upon the best form of manufacture, but certain it is that an alteration will have to be effected in the fuse when it is used with projectiles for the extremely heavy guns, for the gradual combustion of the powder-charge has been found insufficient, when the shell is propelled, to create that shock of discharge necessary to release the detonator, which on the first resistance met by the shell plunges forward and fires the bursting-charge. Unless the detonator is released when first the projectile is moved from its "seat," it follows that the shell will be "blind," and consequently useless for the purpose for which it is intended. Contrary to expectation, the time fuses, although used with the gas-check, were found to answer admirably, thus proving that the windage in muzzle-loading guns can be but imperfectly counteracted.

THE NEW-YORK TIMES was one of the first journals on either side of the Atlantic to record the intention of the British Government to build up a gun of 200 tons, giving general details of its construction. The preliminary steps have now been taken to purchase the necessary plans, the outlay being estimated at $1,200,000. This amount will include the expense attending the enlarged carriages, heavier projectiles, &c., the cost of the gun itself being about $45,000. The first gun will not be completed for upward of 12 months. The large iron works on the Continent, such as Schneider's, at Creuzot, and Krupp's, at Essen, are now constructing homogeneously-cast steel guns of 160 tons and 130 tons respectively. The former should be able to produce results equal to the wrought-iron gun of 200 tons just mentioned. We are evidently not so much in advance of foreigners as was at first supposed.

The great increase in the size of ships' guns has led to the supposition that the days of armor-plated vessels are numbered, and that the fleet which came into a combat without armor would stand the best chance of success, for, it is agreed, a shell would penetrate both sides of a wooden vessel without injury to the crew, and, being more handy than their opponents, would be better adapted for offensive purposes. Experiment has, however, proved that the fuse can be made sufficiently sensitive to burst between decks, and, so long as this contingency is liable to take place, the natural protection to the ship's sides can never be dispensed with. Of course, the erection of iron screens might partially localize the effect of the splinters, but it is doubtful whether the huge splinters of a common shell fired from the 80-ton gun could be effectually guarded against, so as to justify what would now be considered an innovation. The target, composed of 32 inches of iron and 15 inches of teak, will represent the sides of the Inflexible, which vessel it is proposed to arm with four 80-ton guns. The plans for another vessel of even more formidable proportions are now being prepared, upon which will be placed four guns of 160 tons each.

An introduction has lately been made in the British cavalry of mounted pioneers. Two men from each troop will be instructed in the duties, and, in addition to the usual equipment, will be provided with slabs of gun-cotton, and suitable means of igniting the same. I believe the idea of mounted pioneers is derived from America, where the system was introduced by the Northern Army during the late war.

THE MONTROSE DEFAULTER.

From the Scranton (Penn.) Republican, Feb. 3.

The news of Nathan L. Lenheim's enormous defalcations fell upon our neighbors of Montrose, Susquehanna County, the other day, like a clap of thunder from a clear sky. He was a young man who moved in the best society in the place, apparently a devoted member of a Church, beloved and esteemed by all who knew him, the Cashier of a bank in which the wealthiest men of the town were interested, besides being well-to-do himself—all this at the age of 24. With such brilliant prospects before him he dashed them all to the ground in a single day, confounded the community in which he lived, and left the people of the place almost panic-stricken.

But a few days since he left Montrose without stating a word of his affairs to any one, and a week ago to-day he was arrested in New-York for presenting a forged note for the sum of $10,000, to be discounted at the Importers' and Traders' Bank in that City. The forged note was alleged to have been drawn by B. T. Stevens, and indorsed by Mr. S. Kessler, of Easton, who is known to be worth at least $1,000,000. Fortunately, however, the bold trick was detected, and the forger taken in charge by the authorities. The receipt of the startling news completely shocked the people of Montrose, and especially the stockholders of the First National Bank, of which Mr. Lenheim was Cashier. Accordingly an investigation was made, and it was discovered that his bank defalcations reached the enormous sum of $90,000 of money he had squandered in various ways. All efforts to ascertain how he had invested this plunder, or into what channels he could have directed it, have so far proved fruitless, and this portion of the transaction must remain a mystery until the dark sequel of the bold crime is revealed. Of this amount $20,000 had been forged on the bank, and the rest was taken in various ways. As Mr. Lenheim had full control to discount notes and transact other business of the bank at will, and apparently without consulting any of the officers of the institution.

We have ascertained, however, that the defaulting Cashier's bond is good for the greater part of the money stolen, and that the most the bank will lose will be about $24,000. The confidence of the people in its stability is still unshaken, and up to Thursday noon there was double the amount of money deposited that was drawn out. On Wednesday last the bank was closed for an investigation, and for the adjustment of matters that had been deranged by the sudden disappearance of the Cashier, but it was opened yesterday, transacting business as usual. The stockholders have given their note for $40,000 to replenish the depleted treasury and meet present emergencies. They are all men of sound financial standing, and no extraordinary run is anticipated. In fact, one party, to show his faith in the stable character of the concern, deposited $5,000 in it on Tuesday, and others have testified their confidence in it in a similar substantial manner. The liabilities are secured by sound notes, and no such thing as a failure is expected.

The First National Bank of Montrose came into existence about two years ago, and ever since its inception Mr. Nathan L. Lenheim, the forger, has been its Cashier. At the close of the first year's business Mr. D. J. Searle, the Vice President, expressed a good deal of dissatisfaction over the fact that the original plan of referring all loans to a committee before being negotiated was not carried out, and that Mr. Lenheim was negotiating paper without the instructions of any one. This gave rise to such a state of feeling that Mr. Searle said he would either sell his stock or buy out Mr. Lenheim's. The consequence was that Mr. Searle sold out his $15,000 worth for a margin of 20 per cent, and retired from the bank, receiving $3,000 in cash, and the stock (which he still holds) as security. Mr. George W. Beardsley was chosen Vice President in his stead, and Mr. William J. Turrell is President. The First National is the only national bank in town. There is another banking house there, that of William H. Cooper & Co., which has been in existence for 20 years, and is above reproach.

LETTER TO THE EDITOR.

ROBBING PETER TO PAY PAUL.

Your strictures on the bill presented in the Legislature yesterday by Mr. Langbein for the relief of the assessment-payers in this City is, it seems to me, to say the least of it, very ungenerous. You must be aware that between taxes and assessments unproductive property is rapidly being eaten up. I will give you a plain statement of a few facts in relation to a piece of property, almost unproductive, in the Twelfth Ward, which I think will fully verify the above assertion. The Assessors' valuation of the property to which I refer was, in 1850, $6,700, and the taxes were $62 23. In 1860 the valuation of the same property was $21,325, and the taxes were $336 54. In 1870 the valuation of the same property was $42,500, and the taxes were $956 22. In 1876 the valuation of the same property was $77,500, and the taxes $2,170. Now, had the assessments for the so-called improvements been paid for out of the tax levy, as I think they should have been, I could have understood how the enormous increase in taxation happened; but such is not the case. For all the improvements that have been made the cost has been assessed on the adjoining property, and the City has not paid the first cent of it. Within a very few years there have been assessments paid on the above-mentioned property amounting to $28,587 45, and there are now assessments levied on the same property amounting to $14,026 37, and there will be very soon about $2,000 more, making in all upward of $16,000 unpaid.

Our improvements have cost too much. On account of the inflated rate of wages the City was paying for labor at the time the improvements were made, the property-owners were obliged to pay two or three times more for the improvements than they were worth, and on account of the length of time the contractors were allowed to do the work after the time fixed in their contracts had expired, all the benefit expected to be derived from the expenditure was lost. I will trouble you with but one instance: The contract for grading the Ninth avenue, between Eighty-sixth and One Hundred and Tenth streets, was given out in 1869, and the time fixed to finish it up was two years, but it took six years; it was not finished till 1875.

Another contract was given out in 1870, and the time for doing the work was one year; it was not finished till 1874. Had the contractors been compelled to complete their contracts in the time agreed upon, the owners might have been able to dispose of part of their property at fair prices and pay for the improvements. But the crash came long before the work was done, and the property was then unsalable, and to-day it is doubtful if it could be sold for cash at the Assessors' valuation. Now, if, as the Controller says, there are about $18,000,000 of taxes in arrears, how are the $21,500,000 of assessments going to be paid? In the present state of the real estate market it is impossible; but were they allowed to pay the interest on them, I believe an effort would be made to do it, and the City would receive more money and cause less misery than it is doing now under the present system, and no injustice would be done to those who have paid their assessments; for if the City received 7 per cent. and borrowed money at 5 per cent., it would be the gainer.

M.

NEW-YORK, Wednesday, Jan. 31, 1877.

$5,000 DAMAGES AGAINST HER FATHER.

The case of Catharine Flood against David Moore, an action brought by the plaintiff against her father for inflicting injuries upon her husband, which it is alleged caused the latter's death, occupied the attention of the Supreme Court at Albany, Judge Westbrook presiding, last week. The case has been before before tried, and the jury disagreed. Eminent counsel were engaged on both sides, and the suit has been warmly contested. A decision has been finally reached, which the Albany Times of Thursday gives as follows: "The jury came into court at 1 o'clock and rendered the following verdict: 'We as jurors on this suit have exchanged views on this important case between Catharine Flood and David Moore, and carefully weighing the evidence produced, candidly, fairly, and impartially, have arrived at the following verdict: We find for plaintiff $5,000. John W. Couchman, foreman.' Extra allowance of 5 per cent. was granted plaintiff. Stay of 60 days was granted to make a case and exceptions after judgment."

A PRESENT-TAKING GOVERNOR.

We tremble for the peace of mind of the Democrats. Gov. Zebulon Vance, of North Carolina, has received and accepted a present of a wild turkey, and from a colored man, at that. Moreover, he has written the following grateful letter:

EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
RALEIGH, N. C. Jan. 31, 1877.

Mr. D. M. Lee, col.:

DEAR SIR:—Your letter with the turkey which you were so kind as to send me have both been received with great pleasure. I accept them as a testimonial of your good will, and earnestly hope it betokens an era of kind feeling soon to be established between the white and black citizens of North Carolina. I assure you that nothing shall be wanting on my part to bring about such a state of things. Thanking you both for your present and your letter, I am, very sincerely your friend,

Z. B. VANCE.

THE QUESTION OF DIVORCE.

AN ATTACK UPON THE FRENCH LAW.

HOW THE CODE NAPOLEON WAS AMENDED—DIFFICULTY OF SECURING A DIVORCE IN MOST CATHOLIC COUNTRIES—EVIL EFFECTS OF SEPARATION—HOW THE CHURCH REFUSES CONSENT TO A LEGAL DIVORCE.

From Our Own Correspondent.

PARIS, Friday, Jan. 19, 1877.

The Republicans are making some vigorous attacks upon the old order of things in France, whether for good or for evil I will not pretend to say, and among other things, are now agitating the question of divorce. The principle exists in the laws of most of the civilized nations, and divorce is possible in Belgium, a Catholic country. When Napoleon I. founded the Empire and devised those statutes known as the Code Napoleon, his object was to engraft upon the ancient system all that the revolution had in it of good. For the first time the people of France enjoyed the benefits of equality before the law. And, among other things, that powerful genius saw the necessity of admitting into the code the principle of divorce. It was then written in the statutes beside the "separation from bed and board" pronounced by the legal tribunals; but with the Restoration came a Catholic reaction, and the principle was expunged from the code at the demand of the Church. It has always opposed the principle of divorce, for a reason that can readily be understood, but not easily defined in words. It is partially embraced in the phrase generally employed: "What God has joined together let no man put asunder." The clergy pretend to act in the name of the Supreme Being, and when attacked themselves take refuge behind Him from whom, they say, their authority comes by virtue of ordination. The Church, therefore, pretends that it alone has the right to undo what has been done in God's name, and makes formal opposition to the introduction of the principle of divorce into the civil code. The Pope alone claims the right in Catholic countries of pronouncing the decree of divorce, and it is sparingly exercised. Only persons of great influence can hope to procure a dispensation; it was refused even to the Princess de Beauffremont, and she was obliged to get herself naturalized in a country where divorce is recognized, in order to consummate her second marriage.

Louis XVIII., acting under the influence of the clergy, erased the principle of divorce from the French code, but left the separation from bed and board. And what has been the result? A deplorable degradation of public morals. At every step the regulator has to take account of human nature, and not expect too much. Christianity has hitherto exercised a powerful influence in favor of virtue, but its hold seems to be weakening from some cause or other, (probably the dissensions among Christians and the prevalence of sects,) and all can see the time approaching when the civil authority regulating society must be sufficient in itself, and not obliged to count upon this auxiliary. Perhaps we shall have to count upon human interests instead, and regulate marriage in the best possible way for the interest of the two sexes, of the family, and particularly of public morality. For the present it is conceded, I think, that the latter has much to gain by admitting the principle of divorce, under proper restrictions, which the law can provide; but the Church refuses its consent, because the privileges of the anointed are thereby attainted. The civil authority steps in between the clergy and the Supreme Being.

The results of the French system of separation de corps has been deplorable indeed. I think that it has been sufficiently shown in the case of Mme. De Beauffremont, but it is made clearer by the case of Mme. De Germiny. There we have a young and beautiful Countess, having children, tied for life to a man convicted of one of the most infamous crimes imaginable. She cannot bear her own name without dishonor, and she is forbidden to change it. She must wear her degrading chains through life. Evidently, here is a case where divorce would be mercy as well as justice, but the French law refuses it to this poor lady. Her case comes now to strengthen the Republicans in their efforts to get the principle admitted. They show that many thousands of separations are annually pronounced, and that the tribunals thereby give direct encouragement to prostitution, for an honest woman is not permitted to establish herself again in an honest manner; while the honest men who have been shamefully treated only go to swell the ranks of the Lovelaces who are constantly on the lookout for bonnes aventures.

It seems to me the marriage contract ought to be a civil ceremony, and the rights of both parties protected by the civil law as property now is. Dumas was not wrong when he spoke of a young girl's beauty and chastity as "capital," and when we come to think in this way we can make laws that will give the people protection. The idea of the Church in admitting separations is that the parties will make up their quarrels and come together again after a time; but experience shows that only a small percentage of the separations end in this way. The large majority turn toward a life of dissolute order, to use the mildest term, and the worst of it is that only one-half are really to blame. The other half are martyrs to a social condition that should not exist, and which does not exist in countries where divorce is admitted. Here we are told that divorce is not possible on account of the State religion, but at the same time the authorities allow civil burials which are not allowed by the Church, and do a score of things which could not be done if that religion were really respected. This is a topic which is now being brought prominently forward, and the Republicans intend to force it upon the Chamber at no distant date.

Gen. Tchernayeff has arrived in Paris, and has been already "interviewed" by several of the local reporters. The General principally confined himself to an account of his adventures at Prague, from which city he was sent as a "courier noire" by order of the Police. The Slavs wanted to give him an ovation, but the German element resented it and raised a riot in the streets. One can see how rapidly the German element has grown, when it can do this in the very capital of Bohemia. The General says that he shall remain but a few days in Paris, and expects soon to enter the field, though not in Servia.

Another member of the Municipal Council of Paris has come to grief—M. Yves Guyot, editor of Les Droits de l'Homme. A short time ago he wrote a series of articles upon the police of public morals, and was prosecuted for them. The court condemned him to six months' imprisonment and to a fine of 5,000 francs. This judgment causes the loss of all political rights for a period of five years, and M. Guyot ceases ipso facto to be a member of the City Council.

A FISH STORY FROM TROY.

The Troy Press of Saturday evening tells the following: "Our readers can rely on the following rather curious fish story, and if any of them doubt its credibility we can only refer them to the parties who have the curious specimen or nature's creative power, and who will show the phenomenon to the curious. Mr. Scott, at the residence of Dr. P. T. Heartt, of Waterford, has for some time been afflicted with sore eyes. Rather more than a month ago he determined to try the curative powers of salt-water bathing for the afflicted optics. For this purpose he procured a quantity of clear snow and melted it, after which he filtered it carefully and pouring it into a tumbler put into it a small quantity of rock salt. The salt dissolved and every morning and evening for a month a small quantity of the wash was used. Yesterday morning Mrs. Scott conceived that too much dust had settled in the glass, and advised throwing it away and rinsing the glass. Before putting this project into execution she scanned the glass more closely, and was surprised to see swimming about, in a lively manner, a diminutive fish. A close examination followed, and there surely was a small fish about three-fourths of an inch in length, with bright projecting head-like black eyes, and in formation closely resembling a 'bull-head.' The diminutive creature is transparent, and can easily be seen through. The vertebræ of the creature is plainly marked throughout its entire length. The fish has been placed in a bottle and is carefully preserved. It swims about in the watery element as though highly enjoying its saline bath. It is of a pearly pearl color and is daily growing. The question is what is the embryo fish? Where did it come from? Certainly there could have been no germ of life in the snow that had been melted by artificial heat and afterward filtered; neither could there have been any in the coarse particles of salt that had been placed into it. The future developments of this natural curiosity will be looked forward to with interest. Again we say to the skeptical, go to Dr. Heartt's residence and see for yourselves this tiny waif of nature's creation.

A COURT TO BE ABOLISHED.

JUDICIAL INCOMPETENCY EXPOSED.

SENATOR BIXBY'S BILL FOR THE ABOLITION OF THE MARINE COURT—INEFFICIENCY OF THE TRIBUNAL AS AT PRESENT ORGANIZED—HOW THE COURT HAS DEGENERATED—A NEW CITY COURT PROPOSED.

The bill introduced by Senator Bixby in the State Senate recently, which has for its object the abolition of the Marine Court of this City, seems to meet with favor among lawyers generally for various reasons, the principal of which is that the present Marine Court not only fails to accomplish what it should, but really does very little work of any kind and costs much money. Indeed, it is said that, so far as the cases tried by the court in 1876 are concerned, it would have been cheaper for the City to have paid the litigants the whole amount of their claims rather than keep the court in operation. The inefficiency of the court, though in great measure said to be due to the indolence or incompetency of most of the Judges, is, perhaps, primarily owing to a cause which lies deeper than this. This primal cause arises from the fact that the court has departed altogether from its original purpose, which was to give the poorer classes of litigants an opportunity of having their cases tried more speedily and with less costs than they would have if the cases were brought in one of the higher courts, such as the Supreme or Superior Court, or the Court of Common Pleas. A few facts about the origin and general history of the Marine Court may serve to illustrate the point.

ORIGIN AND HISTORY OF THE COURT.

The court is one of the oldest of the State, and owes its origin to the act passed in February, 1797, which abolished the Assistant Justices appointed under the act of 1787, and created in their place Justices of the Peace for the City and County of New-York, unlimited in number, but with the same jurisdiction formerly possessed by the Assistant Justices. The new Justices were constituted a single court, and it was provided that two of their number should sit in rotation at the City Hall. They were empowered to hear and determine all causes where the amount claimed did not exceed £10, and enjoyed all the powers and privileges of Justices of the Peace. The court thus created was afterward known as the Justices' Court, and is now called the Marine Court. Changes in the court were made in 1804 and 1806, and finally, in 1807, an act was passed creating the Justices' Court, consisting of three Justices who had jurisdiction over actions of debts, detinue, accounts, covenants, trespass on case, and trespass wherein the amount demanded was over $25 and did not exceed $50. In 1813, by the revision, the court was continued, and the Governor was empowered to appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Council of Appointment, three proper and discreet persons as Justices of the court, whose commissions were to be for three years. In 1817 the Justices' Court was given jurisdiction in arresting ships and vessels for debts contracted by the master, owner, or consignee for such ships or vessels in this State. The name of the court was changed to the Marine Court in 1819. From this time forward the court was separated absolutely from the Assistant Justices' Court, which is now known as the District Court. The act of 1819 took away from the latter court the jurisdiction to try suits for seamen's wages. The jurisdiction of the Marine Court was increased from time to time until now, when it has the right to try causes in which the amount demanded is as much as $2,000. In cases of suits for personal injuries it has jurisdiction, no matter how large the amount sued for. The court has also been made a court of record, having its Chief Justice, its General Term, and all the other paraphernalia which characterize the higher courts. The costs, too, have been increased in a preposterous way, by making them equal to those obtained in the Supreme Court. The effect of all these changes has been mischievous in the extreme.

From the history of the court as above given, it will be seen that the purpose of the law-makers in creating it was to make it emphatically the poor man's court. When its foundation was laid, cases, like that of Jarndyce against Jarndyce, which consumed in their progress more time than is usually allotted to the span of a human life, were not altogether anomalies even in the Empire State. The law's delay, so often and so bitterly referred to and reflected on, which might be borne with some degree of equanimity and fortitude by the well-to-do, bore most heavily and cruelly on the poor persons who sought redress by the law of the land for wages wrongfully withheld, or for injuries to their persons or small mites of property. The Justices' Courts of those early days, oftentimes presided over by persons of little if any legal education, were not felt to be proper places for resort, as the cases of real consequence were not apt to receive in such tribunals the consideration which was properly their due. The higher courts were too high for the poor to resort to. Besides their delays, their litigations were very costly. A poor laborer, servant, mechanic, or seaman was hardly willing to run the risk of bringing a suit which might last for a long time, and which might result in saddling him with more costs than the amount of his claim. So the Marine Court came into being as a kind of intermediate step between the Courts of Justices of the Peace, and the high courts of common law and equity jurisdiction. For years the court did good work. Its Justices were, in general, competent men, and they were, besides, good working men. Cases were reached and disposed of within a few weeks after issue was joined, and trials were short and decisive. If an action warranted it, an appeal was taken from the decision of the court to the Court of Common Pleas, and thence, at times, to the highest appellate tribunal. The costs were very moderate to the litigants, and the expense of running the court itself was very small. But the times changed, and with the addition of new powers and more Judges to the court it seems to have fallen away, step by step, from the objects and purposes which it should have attained. In spite of its increased powers it became lowered in public respect. It was in this court that an honorable Judge, as it is said, presided in the trial of causes, having before him on the bench his glass of beer and his pretzel, and it was in this court, and at not a very remote date, that another honorable Judge took the liberty of deciding a case against and in the teeth of a decision of the highest tribunals of the State and nation. There have been some Judges in the court of late years who have betrayed a most remarkable ignorance of the laws they were called on, by virtue of their offices, to execute. Cases which should have been disposed of in an hour have been allowed to drag their weary length along for several days. Judges have been absolutely idle for months at a time. One, two, or three trial terms of the court have been kept running for portions only of a term, and frequent adjournments have been had, when four trial terms should have been held continuously during each month. Then, too, came the act of the Legislature increasing the costs which can be recovered in the court. According to this latter act, which is now in operation, there would be about $110 of costs in a case in which no more than $75 were involved. A large number of scalawag lawyers, on finding out about the increase of costs in the court, brought all kinds of petty actions which should have been brought in the district courts, where the costs are very light comparatively. The existence of the General Term of the Marine Court is put forward as one reason why the trial terms should not be in session during the whole of a term, as the Judges must prepare themselves for their duties at the General Term. Without commenting on the weakness of this, it must nevertheless be stated as a fact, that by reason of the lack of ability or energy or work at the trial terms, by reason of the great influx of petty causes, and because of the long-continued spells of idleness on the part of the Judges, the calendars of the court have become so overburdened that causes can be brought to trial only after very long delays and annoyances, and the court itself fails utterly to accomplish the purposes for which it was designed. Taking the record of the work done by the court in 1876, the following result is shown as far as the number of trials in each month is concerned:

Month.	Number of Trials.	Month.	Number of Trials.
January	79	July	2
February	78	August	0
March	50	Septe mber	12
April	37	October	22
May	60	November	10
June	55	December	10
Total	415

As there are six Judges to the court this gives each Judge an average of 69 cases for the year, or little more than one case per week. Some of this apparent lack of work is, of course, due to the fact of Judge Spaulding's death during the year. But no reason is given why certain of the other Judges should have vacations of three, four, or five months, and then transact business only during portions of the other months. No better evidence need be given of the incompetency of the court as at present constituted than the statement of the fact that during 1876 2,713 causes were put on the calendar and only 415 disposed of. Under these circumstances the court must be continually falling behind its calendar. After the convening of the Legislature the Judges seemed to think some action was necessary, and they realized that the court was not keeping pace with the requirements. So during last month 208 causes were disposed of. In justice, however, it must be said that in general a great deal of work has been done in the chambers of the court, but in this branch by a kind of common consent the same Judge has been kept for months in succession during the busy seasons of the year, and the fact of his working cannot be urged as any reason why the others should be less active nor why he should have been given so long a vacation as he received by the vote of his brethren of the bench. The cost of the court is about $112,000 per year. To this may be added about $13,000 received for fees, and the total is $125,000. As only 415 cases were really tried during last year this would make over $300 each; 19 out of 20 of the cases involved less than $300.

SENATOR BIXBY'S BILL.

The bill introduced by Senator Bixby proposes, after doing away with the Marine Court, to substitute in its stead a court to be known as the "City Court of New-York." The latter tribunal is to consist of four Judges, to be elected in November next. The Judges are to be classified, and are to hold office respectively until 1881, 1883, 1885, and 1887. One Judge of the court is to be balloted for in 1880, and every two years thereafter, and every such Judge elected is to hold office for eight years. The Mayor is to have power to fill vacancies. No person is to be a Judge of the court who has not been an attorney for 10 years. The jurisdiction of the court is to be reduced to money actions involving less than $1,000, mechanics' lien cases, and the present court's marine jurisdiction. The practice and procedure of the new court are to be made to conform to those of the other courts. In cases where the recovery, exclusive of costs, shall not exceed $250, excepting in replevin suits, or actions for unliquidated damages, no more costs are to be allowed than are allowed in the district courts, unless the case is such a one as the latter courts have not jurisdiction to try. Three trial terms of the court are to be held in each month, excepting the months of July and August. The terms are to begin on the first Monday in each month, and to continue from day to day. Saturdays, Sundays, and established holidays excepted, until and including the Friday preceding the first Monday in the following month. The sessions of the court are to begin at 10 A. M. A special term for ex parte matters is to be held each month. There is to be no General Term of the court, but appeals in proper cases are to be to the General Term of the Court of Common Pleas. The Clerk of the court is to be appointed by the Judges, and is to hold office for four years, and is to give bonds in $20,000. He is to have power to remove deputy Clerks and attendants. An interpreter and three stenographers are to be attached to the court. All fees received by the Clerk will have to be paid into the City Treasury, and an account under oath rendered of such fees. The Clerk is to receive no salary for any month until the fees of the month are paid over to the Chamberlain. The Judges are to receive $7,500 per year, the Clerk $4,000, the Deputy Clerk $3,000, the Docket Clerk $2,500, the assistant clerks and the General Clerk each $1,800; each stenographer $1,500, each interpreter $1,200, and each attendant $1,000. Contemporaneous with the abolition of the Marine Court, according to the act, is to take place on Dec. 31, 1877, and the new City Court is to begin its labors on Jan. 1, 1878.

Under this system, its advocates claim, the new court can be carried on at a cost of no more than $64,000 per year, instead of the $112,000 which the Marine Court costs. Besides this, the Clerk of the City Court will be compelled to turn over to the City Chamberlain all the fees and other perquisites received by him and his assistants. This is a matter which gave ex-Controller Green much uneasiness. The new provisions concerning the costs in actions which might have been brought in the District Courts will have the effect of giving to the latter business which they ought to do, and which they do not do now. As it is, one-half of the causes now on the Marine Court calendar should have been brought in the District Courts, where they would have been disposed of speedily. The abolition of a General Term will also rid the City, among other things, of the burden of paying the Clerk, a son-in-law of Judge Alker, a salary of $2,000 per year for doing about 10 weeks of actual work. The bill in regard to the new City Court is, however, defective in not limiting the number of assistant clerks and attendants.

THE PROBABLE ORIGIN OF THE MARINE COURT.

Once upon a time, not within the memory of the present generation, a Tammany Boss had a mental emotion, or what people more used to it would call an idea. He knew no judiciary was good for anything except to make citizens and voters of fellow-exiles from the Emerald Isle. He contemplated in his sovereign mind's eye a half-dozen Justices of the Peace wasted and completely inutilized because the invidious statute law denied them those honors and emoluments which his friends Barnard and McCunn earned as naturalization mills. He knew the party's ever-increasing need for real voters, which time and improving public sentiment would still increase, like Oliver Twist's appetite, and which repeating and counting could never obviate absolutely. Samuel Jones Tilden, aged 19, was in those days freshly arrived from the country districts, and had whispered the above and more sly suggestions in the ear of our hero. And then, in their prophetic minds, they foresaw the present emergency, and the troubles Little Samuel would grow up to in these latter days. And thinking to utilize Sinnott, then Mr. Tilden's guileless office boy, and to have him grow up to be a Justice of the Marine Court, and to write campaign letters defending his employer, thus those two vainly plotted against fate. The Boss said: "We'll put those six 'squires' together and make a court out of them, and have them naturalize. I know Capt. Jinks. We'll name, name it after him, the Marine Court." Mr. Tilden said "amen" to his Boss; for the hearts of those two always beat together as one.

Thus originated a court whose jurisdiction, from small beginnings, has been raised and broadened in almost all classes of civil actions, by successive Legislatures, until it has more power and fewer restrictions from the statutes, in some respects, than any court in the State, excepting only that it can enter no one judgment for more than $2,000. Our chronology and our cosmogony may not be strictly historical. May be Darwin would sooner evolute the Marine Court out of a sailor, or say a land-pirate, than from the "Marines." In process of time the superiority of modern invention has rendered this court's powers of naturalization altogether a useless and forgotten fact in history. We only need to know that Tammany Hall was, and always has been, its fountain-head and foster spirit, and never elected a Republican to its bench. The portrait of its reigning Boss stands on the centre-table in its offices, in plush and gilt frame, or hangs high on its walls; like the mariner's guardian angel aloft,

"There's a sweet little cherub that sits up aloft,
'To keep watch' for poor Jack."

The sameness of the origin will explain to the unsatisfied that our court was modeled after that other in Hades, where Mr. Justice Rhadamanthus sat at Trial Term, and held a General Term with his colleagues, Jus ices Minos and Æacus. Nevertheless, for the sake of the condemned, it is our trust that there were never—not even after such general massacres of Southern Democrats by negroes as the World tells us of—so many as 5,000 cases, and twice as many wretched suitors, waiting year in and year out for trial at the judgment seat of Purgatory. The nether tribunal could not procure in all its precincts such clerks as the Tammany General Committee provides our courts with. We trust there never could be there below such confusion and delay of justice, which is worse than prompt injustice, and thus such a field for shysters and sheriffs and iniquitous debtors. There are causes in the Marine Court which have waited in vain over a year to be reached for the first time. There are causes which have been reached and left lingering on the day calendar a year before trial. There are causes which were argued, tried and submitted over a year ago, in which no decision has ever been rendered. There are actions ordered on last April for immediate trial, wherein the orders have never been obeyed. There are trifling appeals, brought for delay, and pending before the General Term, some delayed six months before argument, and others waiting six months or nearly a year after argument for an "opinion."

The contempts of the orders of court are as numerous and continue as ridiculous as in the court of the Grand Duchess. Two of the Judges, who, with their most recent colleague, seem determined to do their individual part to reform these matters, have lately spoken plainly about them—one from the bench, and the other in a letter to the press; still, their hands are tied by the powers behind them. We can easily believe that the Judges would have as efficient a clerical staff in their courts as in their private offices if allowed to choose for themselves. Few of them have the daring or the appreciation of the public approval to follow the course Recorder Hackett took when Tammany undertook to dictate to him who should be the officers of his court.

The Bar Association were very zealous some years ago to establish what they called the Municipal Court, and possibly to dispense thereby with the Marine Court. They had a bill for some such purpose and a committee to present it to the Legislature. They honored themselves by appointing Mr. Peter B. Olney the chairman of that committee. Still, Mr. Olney is an officer of Tammany and a friend of the present Boss. The lawyers were not sagacious in choosing one of the proprietors to clean out the Augean stables. The Bar Association has been lamentably silent since, and nothing has been heard of the bill. They will do well for themselves and their clients to rouse themselves again and to recommend their bill or some other vigorous remedy, likely to enforce and to expedite justice, to the present Republican Legislature, which last can in no way better credit its party than by affording speedy relief to the thousands of distressed creditors whose money is kept from them or finally lost to them by the delays of the Marine Court. If the bill Senator Bixby has proposed has objections, some other can be originated without them.

NEW CHURCH DOCTRINES.

THE DEATH OF THE SOUL.

DR. CHAUNCEY GILES' SECOND LECTURE ON THE SWEDENBORGIAN THEORIES OF DEATH AND THE RESURRECTION—THE NATURE AND ATTRIBUTES OF SPIRITUAL DEATH.

Dr. Chauncey Giles last evening delivered the second of his series of lectures on "Death and the Resurrection" at the Church of the New-Jerusalem, (Swedenborgian), in East Thirty-fifth street, between Park and Lexington avenues. The lecture was entitled "The Death of the Soul," and was devoted to the consideration of the Swedenborgian theory that while the death of the body, or material death, was simply a step toward the attainment of man's higher life, and not a punishment for sin, the death of the soul resulted directly from the disobedience of God's laws of life, the violation of which constituted sin.

In opening the lecture, Dr. Giles briefly referred to his previous discourse, which had been devoted to a demonstration of the fact that the dissolution of the material body was not caused by sin, but was a provision of the Divine economy for the benefit of man, a provision by means of which he attained the higher ends of his being. This, said Dr. Giles, is the material death; but there is another death which is the interruption of the Divine order and the destruction of every human element in man's nature and every possibility of human happiness. This is the spiritual death, which takes place before the dissolution of the body. As this spiritual death is a question which touches every human interest for time and eternity, the subject is worthy of our careful and patient thought. Spiritual death is not a subject which lies upon the surface of our knowledge, but it involves radical distinctions, and is based on the fundamental and interior principles of man's nature and relations to the Lord. There is only one way of learning with absolute certainty what it is, and of understanding what the Lord has revealed to us upon the subject in the Scriptures. In order to understand spiritual death we must first understand spiritual life. In the whole of the Scriptures, from Genesis to Revelation, the Lord teaches us that spiritual life consists essentially in the capacity of loving Him and our neighbors. There may be, said the speaker, a vast development of man's natural mind without that development being accompanied by a particle of love of God, or of unselfish love of man. The life of every created being is love, and the love which any created being receives and exercises is the measure, both in degree and quality, of that being's life. Heavenly love, which is the love of the Lord and the neighbor, is therefore spiritual life, and the possession and exercise of it by man constitute his humanity. Consequently, the Lord in all His relations to man seeks to imbue him with this love. The first commandment—first in time, first in place, and first in importance—is "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, soul, mind, and strength," and the second, "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself." Love is the fulfilling of this law, and the whole Bible testifies that spiritual love is the life of the Lord Himself, the life of every angel, and the life of every man and woman who has begun to live. If, then, the love of the Lord is spiritual life, the absence of such love, or its willful perversion, is spiritual death. When his love of the Lord is changed to love of self, and his love of his neighbor to the love of the world, man fails from life to death. The higher principles which constitute the essential elements of his humanity perish, and he lives only on the natural plane of his faculties. The spiritual, the human, are dead. Spiritual death is a state of the human soul in which, the higher faculties having died out, the natural faculties, too, have lost their control and guidance. They thus become perverted, and rush into every evil and falsity. Those that are under the supreme control of these disorganized principles are dead, however active they may be in the natural plane of their faculties. They are dead to all the activities, perceptions, and joys of a heavenly life, just as the material body, when the spirit has left it, is dead to all the activities, sensations, and delights of this world.

Having ascertained what constitutes spiritual death, the next step, said the speaker, is to discover its cause. On this point the Bible teaches, as clearly as words can express any truth, that it is caused by disobedience of the laws which govern man's spiritual nature and his relations to his God. These laws are always in force, whether expressed in language or not, and the penalty of their violation, whether stated or not, will surely follow, all God's laws being self-executing. Keeping this idea in the mind, it is easy to see why disobedience of them resulted, and must inevitably result, in man's spiritual death. They were the laws of life, and the constituents of man's nature, and consequently, when they were disobeyed man began to die. The violation of these divine laws as embodied in man's nature being sin, spiritual death, therefore, comes by sin. The Lord does not cause this death, although the idea that He does is frequently expressed. It is simply the result of disobedience of the laws of spiritual life, which is followed by the same penalty as the disobedience of the laws of the natural life. This spiritual death has its delights, which are enjoyed by those who are spiritually dead. A human being spiritually dead, from the absence from his nature of the principle of spiritual life, has still what he calls life, and what seems to him the only life worth possessing. It is a life of strong affections, great intellectual endowments and power, and intense activities. All the animal delights, all the pleasures that are derived from taste and feeling, when they are not controled, regulated, exalted, and directed by love of God and men, are the delights of the spiritual death, and these delights are conceived to be the highest and most substantial happiness by multitudes of men and women. This ideal ranges through all degrees, from the savage to those who exhaust human skill to compound delicacies to stimulate and gratify the taste. There is no spirituality in their enjoyment, however. There is no spiritual life either in the active, pushing, shrewd, tireless, circumspect men, who devote their energies to the accumulation of riches. It is merely a perverted affection, with no soul of goodness, no love of God or man in it. The joys of spiritual death are seen also in the amusements and entertainments of social life. There are men and women, highly cultivated, graceful and pleasing in manners, elegant in attire, charming in conversation, whose only ambition is to shine in the circles of "good society," to be admired for taste and many and fashionable accomplishments—to whom this charmed circle is heaven. But these creatures, with all their graces, rich attire, and brilliant accomplishments, are dead in the eye of the Lord and the angels, and when measured by the only true and immutable standard have no more genuine life than skeletons whose flesh has turned to dust.

Many human beings regard high intellectual development as the exponent of the true and noble life in its highest forms. But is it so? The high development of the intellectual faculties may be possible without a particle of spiritual and true life. Many of our great scientists cannot see God in man or nature. They decompose, analyze, and reconstruct forms of matter, but they cannot find the evidence of Divine existence in any of their finely-spun theories, and with the consummate wisdom of spiritual death under that name in no Divine existence. They have no spiritual sight, and consequently they can see nothing spiritual or divine either in nature or in man. But they have their joys. They are giants in their own estimation, and look down with pity upon the deluded beings who see the Lord in nature, and who feel the quickening breath of His love in their hearts. So, the speaker continued, we might go through all ages, examine all occupations, weigh all human attainments, and investigate all forms of society, and we would find these spiritually dead everywhere. There is no breath or pulse of true life in them, and their higher nature is withered and wasted. It is a noble city buried in ruins beneath the ashes of a moral volcano—a paradise blasted by hot lusts, with its beauty and innocence destroyed. It is populated, it is true, with what are called human beings, but who are merely ghosts of the people who dwelt in the fair City of God, and what men call beauty is grown out of its accumulated dust of generations of sin. But it is the fading beauty of spiritual death.

If, then, the speaker concluded, this death has its hopes, and delights and satisfactions, what is the great difference between it and life, and what is the loss that the spiritually dead sustain? The loss is greater than can be estimated. These joys and pleasures are full of torment, for they are all unsatisfactory and illusionary. There is a poison in every fruit of spiritual death that breeds fears and anxieties, feverish excitements and wrenching agonies. It requires no wrath of God, no omnipotent hand to inflict those torments. Their seed is in the condition of spiritual death itself. They are the effect of the discords and collisions of a nature at war with itself and with all the sources of its life, drifting aimlessly away from its anchorage in the eternal principles of the divine order into darkness without a pilot or helm.

The next lecture on "Spiritual Resurrection" will be delivered on the evening of Sunday next.

FUNERAL OF MRS. ANTHON.

The funeral of Mrs. Emilia Anthon, wife of the late Rev. Henry Anthon, D. D., Rector of St. Mark's Episcopal Church, took place yesterday at the above-named church at 3 P. M. There were no floral offerings, as it had been especially requested that none be sent. Rev. Dr. Rylance officiated, assisted by Dr. Reet and Dr. Newton, both of Anthon Memorial Church. The coffin was borne into the church on the shoulders of four pall bearers, and deposited directly in front of the lectrn. On the lid was a plate bearing the simple inscription, "Emilia Anthon, aged 83 years, died Feb. 1, 1877." Dr. Reet read the lesson from the first epistle of St. Paul to the Romans, commencing at the 20th verse, and from St. John 11th chapter, 25th and 26th verses, beginning, "I am the resurrection and the Life," after which the choir sang "Nearer, my God, to Thee." Rev. Dr. Newton delivered the committal services, and then offered up a short prayer.

THE TOMBS GOSPEL MISSION.

A PUBLIC MEETING IN DR. CROSBY'S CHURCH—THE OBJECTS OF THE MISSION EXPLAINED—WORK ALREADY PERFORMED AMONG THE PRISONERS IN THE TOMBS.

The first public meeting of the Non-denominational Gospel Mission to the Prisoners of the Tombs of New-York, was held in the Fourth Avenue Presbyterian Church last evening. The proceedings were begun by the singing of a hymn by the choir and congregation, and a prayer appropriate to the occasion by Rev. Dr. Howard Crosby, the Pastor of the church. Dr. Crosby then made a brief address, explaining the objects and purposes of the mission. He said that for many years the Tombs Prison had been placed in the care of the Pastor in charge of the Sixth Ward, supported by the New-York Mission and Tract Society. On Jan. 1, 1876, the City Mission gave up its ministerial work in the Tombs, and on the same date, Rev. J. B. Betker, who had had charge of the Tombs, and who had been sustained by this society for three years, resigned his position. It was his attention to seek some other pastoral charge, but when he found the Commissioners of Charities and Correction, together with the Warden and Keepers of the Tombs, and all the male prisoners petitioning the New-York Presbytery for the continuance of his labors, he decided to remain. Since January, 1876, a few generous-hearted Christians had contributed to his support. Mr. Betker was now filling the place vacated by the City Mission, and was prepared, when fully sustained, to give his whole time to the work. With a view to sustain this work and to secure to Mr. Betker an adequate support as Chaplain of the Tombs, a committee of clergymen and laymen had taken in hand the supervision and direction of the work. Following are the names of the gentlemen composing the committee: Clergymen—President, Rev. Howard Crosby, D. D., Pastor of the Fourth Avenue Presbyterian Church; Vice President, Rev. E. P. Rogers, D. D., Pastor of the South Fifth Avenue Reformed Dutch Church; Rev. John Kirkpatrick, Pastor of the United Presbyterian Church; Rev. William T. Sabine, A. M., Pastor of the Madison Avenue Reformed Episcopal Church; Rev. Charles H. Payson, Pastor of Memorial Chapel, Thirtieth street; Rev. Stephen H. Tyng, D. D., Pastor of the Church of the Holy Trinity; Rev. Wesley W. Knapp, D. D., Lauht Street Baptist Church. Laymen—Mr. E. L. Lentilhon, Secretary; Mr. George E. Sterry, Treasurer; Mr. Birdseye Blakeman, Mr. James Little, Dr. Thomas T. Sabine, Mr. Lewis Tibbals, and Mr. Walter Edwards. Dr. Crosby then spoke of the fitness of Mr. Betker for the position, and, after saying that he did not propose to take up any collection in aid of the association at present, and that the object of the meeting was simply to launch the enterprise, as it were, introduced Mr. Betker, who, he said, was more able than he was to give a clear idea of the character of the work to be performed in the Tombs.

Mr. Betker then made a brief address, in which he said that more than 30,000 persons were imprisoned in the Tombs each year, some of them guilty and some innocent of the crimes with which they were charged. He dwelt upon their need of spiritual advice and religious consolation, and gave several instances of the good that had been accomplished by missionary work. Rev. Dr. S. Irenæus Prime and Rev. Dr. E. P. Rogers also spoke briefly in favor of the enterprise, and appealed to the congregation for aid in the work. At the request of Dr. Crosby, Mr. Sterry, the Treasurer, made a statement of the pecuniary condition of the association. He said that about $425 had been contributed thus far to the support of the mission, and that about $1,800 were necessary to keep it up. This sum was needed for the support of the Pastor, and to pay for the service of an organist, and for printing. A hymn was then sung, the benediction was pronounced, and the congregation were dismissed.

SUFFERING EMIGRANTS IN BRAZIL.

The colonization of Brazil is not likely to advance at a very rapid rate, if the story related by Thomas Diller, who is now at Castle Garden, is to be believed. He narrates the experience of a party of Germans, who emigrated in the Spring of 1874, from Nuremburg to the colony of Tierra del Oro. The emigrants had signed articles presented by a Brazilian agent, who had stated that the colony which he represented was in good order, that the land was under cultivation, and that block-houses had already been erected in the colony. When the misguided Germans reached the colony they found it uncultivated, and in its place a wilderness filled with vipers, tigers, chattering monkeys, and parrots. A party of colonists who had preceded them were sick and living in rudely constructed huts, and many had already died. The rain fell steadily for three months after their arrival, and over 300 died during the first month of their residence in the new colony, and between the time of the arrival of Diller's party in July, 1874, until its departure in the following December, 1,830 of the 4,000 colonists died. Baron Munis, of Bahia, surrounded the colony with a detachment of 500 Police from Bahia, and prevented the departure of those emigrants who attempted to make their escape. Most of them were shot by the guard, but ultimately four men succeeded in reaching Cumandaie, where Julius Meyer, the Assistant German Consul, resided, and the latter, after hearing the stories of the cruelties practiced upon his unfortunate countrymen, demanded that they should suffer no further mutilation. Opposition by the Brazilians then ceased, and the Germans began to leave in crowds. Some of them came to this country, but the majority of them returned to Europe.

THE BROOKLYN STRIKE.

A reserve force of policemen was stationed at Police-Headquarters, in Brooklyn, all day yesterday, to be in readiness in case of an emergency arising in reference to the strike among the grain shovellers. Inspector Waddy was informed that threats had been made against him by some of the more violent of the strikers, who said that if it had not been for his interference the trouble between themselves and their employers would have been settled soon after it originated. The strikers loitered about the docks yesterday morning, and in the afternoon gathered in knots to talk over the situation. They were constantly under the surveillance of the Police, and Detectives Zundt and Looney closely watched their movements. Superintendent Campbell said last evening that he thought it probable that something definite would be done to-day, resulting either in a settlement or a widening of the breach. The Police force, he said, would continue on duty to protect the men at work, and to prevent any disturbance among the strikers. The Superintendent had a consultation last evening with Inspector Waddy and some of the Police Captains to make arrangements for reserves to be ready at all the stationhouses, to be called upon at a moment's notice.

ALLEGED FELONIOUS ASSAULT.

On Dec. 18 Charles Cuff was shot in the side by Thomas King in an affray on the corner of Houston street and Broadway. No arrests were made at the time, and Cuff, who was badly hurt, was carried to his lodgings. Coroner Woltman, having been informed that the wounded man was expected to die, called on him in order to take his ante-mortem deposition, but Cuff refused to say anything in regard to the matter. On Friday last, however, having recovered sufficiently to be able to leave his room, he appeared before Justice Flammer, at the Washington Place Police Court, and made a charge of felonious assault against King. A warrant was issued and King was arrested, and an examination was held by the Justice yesterday. Cuff was sent to the House of Detention in default of $1,000 bail for his appearance, and King was remanded for further examination.

THE ELECTORAL TRIBUNAL.

CLOSE OF ARGUMENT ON FLORIDA.

SPEECHES OF MESSRS. EVARTS AND O'CONOR —THE RIGHT TO GO BEHIND THE CERTIFICATES OF THE STATE AUTHORITIES THE CHIEF POINT OF DISPUTE—A CROWDED AND ATTENTIVE COURT-ROOM —HALF THE AUDIENCE STANDING DURING THREE HOURS—SESSIONS OF THE COMMISSION FOR CONSULTATION—NO PUBLIC SESSION TO-DAY.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 5.—The Electoral Commission has now reached a most critical point in its deliberations, which involves the principles upon which all the Electoral disputes must be decided. The arguments are closed, and the Commission must now determine what its own powers are in respect to hearing testimony and investigating the facts of the election. The closing arguments upon this great preliminary question attracted a crowd to the Capitol, but most visitors were doomed to disappointment, for the Supreme Court-room will not hold, when packed as it was to-day, above 350 persons, including the Commissioners, its officers, and the counsel. To-day Attorney General Taft sat through the arguments, Secretary Robeson was present for a time, and Secretary Fish came in during Mr. Evarts' speech and remained till the end of the public hearing. There were nearly 20 Senators and perhaps twice as many Members of the House among the audience. Many ladies obtained admittance. Nearly, or quite half of all those present stood up during the three hours of speeches. There was nothing striking or dramatic in the proceedings. Some imaginative persons have suggested some resemblance in this proceeding to the trial of Warren Hastings, the issue here being of greater importance and engaging the powers of the greatest lawyers, Judges, and orators of which the nation can boast. Possibly 50 years hence, when the action of this Commission has become history, and when men now not regarded as great have become famous, and when the glamor of distance has settled over the scene, some future essayist may write as dazzling a description of the tribunal as Macaulay has given of the spectacle when Burke impeached Warren Hastings. At present, it must be confessed, one can see but little in the affair that is unusual, unique, picturesque, or dramatic. And yet 15 men are deliberating upon, and will soon decide the greatest constitutional question that has ever agitated the country, except the question of the right of secession, which was decided by a civil war.

Far more important than a decision between Hayes and Tilden for the Presidency, is the question whether Congress can go back of State action and canvass the ballots cast in a State for Presidential Electors; for, if the Commission decides that such power exists, the theory of the Constitution, which has prevailed during the first century of the Republic is overturned, and the election of the Executive is revolutionized. The question to which public attention is turned, however, is the determination of who shall now be President. Excitement is now suppressed, as it is in the course of a trial by jury when the verdict is under consideration and not yet returned. When the decision of the Commission is announced, there will be a change from the present appearance of calmness in political affairs; and particularly if the disputed States should be given by the Commission to Hayes, there will be for a day or two the wildest excitement. If there is nothing worse than excitement to mark the occasion it will indeed be fortunate.

The closing argument of Mr. Evarts, to-day, was listened to with great attention. It was a close legal argument for the most part, and unornamented. Mr. Evarts, with excellent good judgment, spoke for the Commission and not for the audience. He was not on that account, dry and uninteresting, but he appealed to no feeling and aroused no passion, as many seemed to expect he would. He first discussed the question what evidence is now before the tribunal, and in a few sentences showed that there was nothing save the certificates and papers attached, transmitted by the President of the Senate. In respect to the power of the Commission he made the point that it could not undertake a judicial examination of the election without plenary judicial powers, which Congress could only confer upon courts inferior to the Supreme Court, and could not confer upon such a commission as this. He also claimed that if the proceeding was like a quo warranto, the Constitution gave the right of a jury, which must be introduced into the case. He made a good hit at one absurdity of the bill, in remarking that to prevent the appearance of delay in the case, the sun and moon had been made to stand still. The record of Congress shows that all the proceedings since the first joint meeting, are of the date of last Thursday.

Mr. O'Conor made a rather labored and disjointed speech, but on one or two points his argument was exceedingly specious and ingenious. Especially was this the case in meeting the Republican argument concerning the acts of de facto officers. Mr. O'Conor claimed that in this case there had as yet been no result from the acts of the Hayes Electors in Florida, and that their right to the office had been determined before their act had produced any result for the law to uphold. In respect to the quo warranto suit, it should be noted that Mr. Evarts unearthed a Florida statute which shows that this suit was a private suit, not brought in behalf of the State. This is an important fact, upsetting the Democratic argument that the State of Florida had begun the proceedings to invalidate the certificate. Mr. O'Conor, in closing, indulged in some nonsense and claptrap about frauds and the admission of all mankind that Florida had voted for Tilden, which would have been unpardonable, except in an old man not entirely accountable for his words. At the close of his speech the Commission took a recess of 45 minutes, and then began the secret consideration of the questions before it.

THE QUESTION OF THE ADMISSIBILITY OF EVIDENCE TO BE DECIDED TO-DAY—THE CLOSING ARGUMENTS IN THE FLORIDA CASE—THE NEXT JOINT SESSION OF CONGRESS NOT TO BE HELD BEFORE THURSDAY OR FRIDAY.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 5.—The Commission meets again to morrow at noon, and, by an agreement made this afternoon, there will be no adjournment till the preliminary question regarding the kind and extent of the evidence to be received and considered is decided. There was a report to-night that the Commission had decided, by a vote of 11 to 4, to admit all the testimony offered by Mr. O'Conor, and the names of those voting in the negative were given. This rumor is like many curious stories that get afloat, nobody knows how; as, for instance, on Saturday it was quite widely reported that Mr. Tilden was in town. The Commission is no doubt ready to vote on the question of evidence, except that it is desirable to have a previous interchange of views, and some members may desire to make rather long speeches, though the temptation is removed very considerably by the absence of reporters. The next public meeting of the Commission will be on Wednesday morning, when the announcement of the decision respecting the admissibility of evidence will be made under the rules. Four hours more of arguments on the Florida case will be allowed to counsel. The arguments that have been concluded were provided for by special rule, not intended to interfere with the general regulations. Thus, the whole of Wednesday will be consumed, and it will certainly be Thursday, and possibly Friday, before the next joint meeting of the two houses.

PROCEEDINGS BEFORE THE COMMISSION.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 5.—The Commission met at 11 o'clock, the question pending being what evidence, if any, is before the Commission relative to the vote of Florida in the recent Presidential election, and what are the powers and duties of the Commission in the premises. Mr. Evarts, for the Republican side, said:

ARGUMENT OF MR. EVARTS.

MR. PRESIDENT AND GENTLEMEN OF THE COMMISSION: The order of the Commission in directing the attention of counsel lays out for their consideration three topics: First, whether, under the powers possessed by the Commission, any evidence can be received beyond that disclosed in the three certificates from the State of Florida, which were opened by the President of the Senate, in the presence of the two houses of Congress, and which, under the authority of the recent act of Congress are transmitted to this Commission; second, if any can be received, what that evidence is; and, thirdly, what evidence, other than the certificates, if any, is now before the Commission. I will dispose of the last question, under the order of the Commission, first. It requires but brief attention to express our views, and will, I think, require but little consideration in time, however important it may be in substance, from the Commission. It is suggested that certain packages of papers, which were borne into the presence of the Commission by the messenger that brought the certificates and objections here, are already evidence in the possession of the Commission. What these packages contain, with respect to authenticity, or what scope of efficacy is to be given to them, as particular matters of evidence and particular forms of proof, are unknown to us, and unknown to the Commission. The proposition upon which it is claimed that this evidence, whatever it may be, is "subject undoubtedly to discussion and to rejection by the Commission as not pertinent and not important," and which is mentioned in one of the objections interposed against the first certificate as matter on which the objection was founded, instead of being a warrant, as it were, to the objector on which he objects. He (the objector) thereby makes a part of the evidence upon the Commission. I am able to read from page 32 of the Record, of Saturday, in the report of the minority committee:

"Extract from testimony before the Florida State Canvassing Board, Monday, Dec. 4, 1876:

Mr. Humphreys sworn.

Q.—Are you Collector of Customs or Commissioner for the Port of Pensacola? A.—I am not.

Q.—Were you, at one time? A.—I was at one time.

Q.—When? A.—Previous to the 7th November.

Q.—What time did you resign? A.—The acceptance of my resignation was received from Judge Woods about a week or 10 days before the election, which I have on file in my office; I did not think of its being questioned, or I would have it here; he stated in his letter to me that the Collector of Customs would perform the duties of the office, and the Collector of Customs has since done so."

Now, on the nature of an objection for disqualification as a subject of proof requiring its production, in order that the two houses, or the President of the Senate, in either attribution of authority, under the clause of the Constitution governing their joint meeting, would needs to be satisfied, I will attempt to answer the suggestion, in the form of inquiry, made very pertinently and forcibly by Mr. Commissioner Thurman the other day. As I understand the matter—and I will not repeat or anticipate a discussion that must occur later in the form on my part in this argument—there is a consideration in this case of whether the houses of Congress, in the matter of the count, or the President of the Senate, it he have authority at the time of their meeting for the constitutional duty of opening and counting the votes, has any power under existing law for the preservation of the methods of proof. Whatever may be thought on the question of whether this subject of disqualification of this nature was proper for the scrutiny of the votes to be counted, and however proper it might have been for the houses of Congress to provide for the production of proof of that transaction and for the manner in which it might be adduced and considered, there is no act of Congress on the subject; and our proposition is that at that stage of the transaction of the election, Congress, the two houses, and the President of the Senate cannot entertain that subject of proof; that the process must go on of counting, and that if a disqualified Elector has passed the observation of the voters in the State, passed the observation of any sentinels or guards that may have been provided in the law for excluding from actual election, or for admitting of an apparent right—if this disqualification should be made to appear, that when these are all over and past, and the vote stands on the presentation and authentication of the Constitution which is the certificate of the Electors themselves, and on the act of Congress, it must stand unchallengeable and unimpeachable there. Of course the provisional means of inquiry at that stage, of Congress if they had thought fit to provide any, would have involved the delays of such an inquiry. The proof of its infirmity and the proof of its removal are matters ordinarily manageable; perhaps in point of time not leading to prolixity, but in supposable cases involving the contradiction of witnesses and discussion as to the effect of testimony.

THE STATE'S RECORD OF ITS ELECTION FINAL.

Now, Mr. Commissioner Thurman asks the question: Suppose the Electoral return, when opened, discloses the fact that the four Electors then present were members of Congress, and had been at the time of the appointment? That involves an element, you perceive, not touched by the considerations that belong to proof. That impeachment of qualifications in the Electors supposed is of ocular and personal observation at all times, of the President of the Senate and of the two houses of Congress, and of the record of the nation at the Capitol; and if the instance is merely that of a member of Congress, excluded in the list, and not presently a member, involving, by extraneous proof, whether or not at a certain date there had been completed an act of his retirement from the office, so that the disqualification did not exist in fact, then the case in which the Congressman is used as an instance falls back into the class of cases where there has been no provision for extraneous proof; and while the office accorded to the Governor's certificate is not required to be surrounded by extraneous proof to his certificate, but by transcendent and present evidence of the disqualification of the members of Congress, there is, as we suppose, no safe rule except to say that this injunction laid upon the State, that Congress will not look into the appointments the proscribed, excluded persons, does not execute itself under the Constitution, and if unexecuted in the law of the State, is only to be executed by the laws of Congress providing a means of time and place of execution. Now, I have said this tribunal cannot receive evidence in addition to the certificates, of the nature of that which is offered—that is, evidence that goes beyond the State's record of its election, which has been certified by the Governor as resulting in the appointment of those Electors. One reason of this proposition, and on which sufficiently it rests, is that there is a judicial inquiry into the very matter of right, the title to office; for it accepts as its function the prevalence of the former, the certificated, the recorded title of the Electors, and proposes then to inquire as inter partes, and the matter of right, which of the two competitors are really elected on an honest and searching investigation. It undertakes an office that is judicial, and the powers for its exercise are attempted to be invoked in favor of those who support that view, by the necessity of the exercise of the imputed power requiring adequate means. What are adequate means? Adequate means for that investigation are plenary means. There are no means, judicial, that are adequate for that inquiry that are not plenary, and no plenary, judicial powers can be communicated under our Constitution by Congress, to say nothing of minor powers that are judicial in their nature, except to tribunals that are courts, tribunals that are inferior to the Supreme Court, and that are filled by Judges appointed by the President of the United States and confirmed by the Senate. Will any lawyer, expert or inexpert mention a topic or method of judicature, or jurisprudence that involves the possession of larger means of reach and more complete control of powers and methods than the trial of a quo warranto for an office, that is, to ascertain election? But not only is it beyond the power of Congress to transfer the powers of this law to this Commission, the powers of a court of this plenary reach and efficiency; but, on the top of quo warranto, to try the title of an officer, they would find a subject in regard to which the Constitution had interposed an insurmountable barrier to the constitution of a court like this. The quo warranto is a matter and an action of the common law; it involves as a matter of right the introduction of a jury into its methods. No case of contested election was ever tried under the sense of the State's use of the proper tribunal without a jury, but the provision here is that in every action of a certain amount of dignity the right of trial by jury shall exist, and the verdict shall never be examined except by the rules of common law. Now, can it be said that judicial power here and judicial power originating under Congressional authority to make courts, is the source of this authority claimed? These are impediments that cannot be surmounted.

THE EFFECT OF QUO WARRANTO.

I will ask your Honor's attention in connection with the topic that I last discussed and in pertinent relation to the present—to the case of Groome against Gwyn, in the Forty-third Maryland Reports, beginning at page 572; the subjects interesting here, and especially, begin, I think, at page 634, to show that this argument that a duty supposed to exist by attribution of law or the Constitution, must carry to itself in the functionary charged with its exercise all the powers necessary, (upon the argument that the duty must involve the powers,) finds no place in our jurisprudence. The argument has to be the other way. If the functionary of the Commission has not been clothed with those authorities, then the duty is not accorded or the means of its exercise are not furnished, and so it cannot be discharged. In the case of Groome against Gwyn, the Governor had by the Constitution, as was claimed, (and was held by the majority of the court,) the power to determine the contest for the office of Attorney General for the State of Maryland; and the Governor, finding by his own inspection of the testimony that he lacked the means of carrying out the scrutiny that must decide, held that he could not exercise it, and he would not exercise it unless judicial authority imposed it upon him; and assuming that the claimant against the final canvass had the mere right, and that the Governor was made an authority to conduct a contest, he had no powers of subpœna and had no provision for taking proof, and the Court of Appeals, on an application for mandamus to compel the Governor to undertake that constitutional duty, held that he was vested by the Constitution with an authority to be the contesting functionary, but that the laws of Maryland had not executed the Constitution to furnish him with powers to perform the duty assigned to him, and that the mandamus must go against him to deliver the certificates to the man who on the corrupt canvass was returned as having the majority, and that the preliminary contest that might have been made effectual to exclude the wrong man because of an wrong canvass, must be proper to the judiciary powers of the State, lodged in the courts in the shape of a quo warranto on a dispute with the inducted candidate, that the Governor might or would have decided not to be entitled to the office. This bears upon both branches of the consideration. First, upon your assumption of your powers from your having a general duty; second, upon the consideration of whether a duty assigned to the Governor, as of his official transaction ministerially, will not be compelled always, as in other cases, to resort to justice to try the foundation of the discussion of the writ in the courts of justice. I find in this act of 1877 no such purpose in the arrangement of powers as to make it a court under the Constitution. I find no appointment of these Judges to this court under the powers of the Constitution. I find no means for writs and for subpœnas provided by the learned counsel that we might introduce evidence that Mr. Humphreys had resigned. The interposition of this objection was a surprise to us, for it was a matter of inquiry before the Florida State Canvassing Board on the 4th day of December, 1876, antecedent to their final and conclusive canvass, that Mr. Humphreys was. I am able to read from page 32 of the Record, of Saturday, in the report of the minority committee:

"Extract from testimony before the Florida State Canvassing Board, Monday, Dec. 4, 1876:

Mr. Humphreys sworn.

Q.—When? A.—Previous to the 7th November.

Q.—What time did you resign? A.—The acceptance of my resignation was received from Judge Woods about a week or 10 days before the election, which I have on file in my office; I did not think of its being questioned, or I would have it here; he stated in his letter to me that the Collector of Customs would perform the duties of the office, and the Collector of Customs has since done so."

Now, on the nature of an objection for disqualification as a subject of proof requiring its production, in order that the two houses, or the President of the Senate, in either attribution of authority, under the clause of the Constitution governing their joint meeting, would needs to be satisfied, I will attempt to answer the suggestion, in the form of inquiry, made very pertinently and forcibly by Mr. Commissioner Thurman the other day. As I understand the matter—and I will not repeat or anticipate a discussion that must occur later in the form on my part in this argument—there is a consideration in this case of whether the houses of Congress, in the matter of the count, or the President of the Senate, it he have authority at the time of their meeting for the constitutional duty of opening and counting the votes, has any power under existing law for the preservation of the methods of proof. Whatever may be thought on the question of whether this subject of disqualification of this nature was proper for the scrutiny of the votes to be counted, and however proper it might have been for the houses of Congress to provide for the production of proof of that transaction and for the manner in which it might be adduced and considered, there is no act of Congress on the subject; and our proposition is that at that stage of the transaction of the election, Congress, the two houses, and the President of the Senate cannot entertain that subject of proof; that the process must go on of counting, and that if a disqualified Elector has passed the observation of the voters in the State, passed the observation of any sentinels or guards that may have been provided in the law for excluding from actual election, or for admitting of an apparent right—if this disqualification should be made to appear, that when these are all over and past, and the vote stands on the presentation and authentication of the Constitution which is the certificate of the Electors themselves, and on the act of Congress, it must stand unchallengeable and unimpeachable there. Of course the provisional means of inquiry at that stage, of Congress if they had thought fit to provide any, would have involved the delays of such an inquiry. The proof of its infirmity and the proof of its removal are matters ordinarily manageable; perhaps in point of time not leading to prolixity, but in supposable cases involving the contradiction of witnesses and discussion as to the effect of testimony.

THE STATE'S RECORD OF ITS ELECTION FINAL.

Now, Mr. Commissioner Thurman asks the question: Suppose the Electoral return, when opened, discloses the fact that the four Electors then present were members of Congress, and had been at the time of the appointment? That involves an element, you perceive, not touched by the considerations that belong to proof. That impeachment of qualifications in the Electors supposed is of ocular and personal observation at all times, of the President of the Senate and of the two houses of Congress, and of the record of the nation at the Capitol; and if the instance is merely that of a member of Congress, excluded in the list, and not presently a member, involving, by extraneous proof, whether or not at a certain date there had been completed an act of his retirement from the office, so that the disqualification did not exist in fact, then the case in which the Congressman is used as an instance falls back into the class of cases where there has been no provision for extraneous proof; and while the office accorded to the Governor's certificate is not required to be surrounded by extraneous proof to his certificate, but by transcendent and present evidence of the disqualification of the members of Congress, there is, as we suppose, no safe rule except to say that this injunction laid upon the States, that Congress will not look into the appointments the proscribed, excluded persons, does not execute itself under the Constitution, and if unexecuted in the law of the State, is only to be executed by the laws of Congress providing a means of time and place of execution. Now, I have said this tribunal cannot receive evidence in addition to the certificates, of the nature of that which is offered—that is, evidence that goes beyond the State's record of its election, which has been certified by the Governor as resulting in the appointment of those Electors. One reason of this proposition, and on which sufficiently it rests, is that there is a judicial inquiry into the very matter of right, the title to office; for it accepts as its function the prevalence of the former, the certificated, the recorded title of the Electors, and proposes then to inquire as inter partes, and the matter of right, which of the two competitors are really elected on an honest and searching investigation. It undertakes an office that is judicial, and the powers for its exercise are attempted to be invoked in favor of those who support that view, by the necessity of the exercise of the imputed power requiring adequate means. What are adequate means? Adequate means for that investigation are plenary means. There are no means, judicial, that are adequate for that inquiry that are not plenary, and no plenary, judicial powers can be communicated under our Constitution by Congress, to say nothing of minor powers that are judicial in their nature, except to tribunals that are courts, tribunals that are inferior to the Supreme Court, and that are filled by Judges appointed by the President of the United States and confirmed by the Senate. Will any lawyer, expert or inexpert mention a topic or method of judicature, or jurisprudence that involves the possession of larger means of reach and more complete control of powers and methods than the trial of a quo warranto for an office, that is, to ascertain election? But not only is it beyond the power of Congress to transfer the powers of this law to this Commission, the powers of a court of this plenary reach and efficiency; but, on the top of quo warranto, to try the title of an officer, they would find a subject in regard to which the Constitution had interposed an insurmountable barrier to the constitution of a court like this. The quo warranto is a matter and an action of the common law; it involves as a matter of right the introduction of a jury into its methods. No case of contested election was ever tried under the sense of the State's use of the proper tribunal without a jury, but the provision here is that in every action of a certain amount of dignity the right of trial by jury shall exist, and the verdict shall never be examined except by the rules of common law. Now, can it be said that judicial power here and judicial power originating under Congressional authority to make courts, is the source of this authority claimed? These are impediments that cannot be surmounted.

THE EFFECT OF QUO WARRANTO.

I will ask your Honor's attention in connection with the topic that I last discussed and in pertinent relation to the present—to the case of Groome against Gwyn, in the Forty-third Maryland Reports, beginning at page 572; the subjects interesting here, and especially, begin, I think, at page 634, to show that this argument that a duty supposed to exist by attribution of law or the Constitution, must carry to itself in the functionary charged with its exercise all the powers necessary, (upon the argument that the duty must involve the powers,) finds no place in our jurisprudence. The argument has to be the other way. If the functionary of the Commission has not been clothed with those authorities, then the duty is not accorded or the means of its exercise are not furnished, and so it cannot be discharged. In the case of Groome against Gwyn, the Governor had by the Constitution, as was claimed, (and was held by the majority of the court,) the power to determine the contest for the office of Attorney General for the State of Maryland; and the Governor, finding by his own inspection of the testimony that he lacked the means of carrying out the scrutiny that must decide, held that he could not exercise it, and he would not exercise it unless judicial authority imposed it upon him; and assuming that the claimant against the final canvass had the mere right, and that the Governor was made an authority to conduct a contest, he had no powers of subpœna and had no provision for taking proof, and the Court of Appeals, on an application for mandamus to compel the Governor to undertake that constitutional duty, held that he was vested by the Constitution with an authority to be the contesting functionary, but that the laws of Maryland had not executed the Constitution to furnish him with powers to perform the duty assigned to him, and that the mandamus must go against him to deliver the certificates to the man who on the corrupt canvass was returned as having the majority, and that the preliminary contest that might have been made effectual to exclude the wrong man because of an wrong canvass, must be proper to the judiciary powers of the State, lodged in the courts in the shape of a quo warranto on a dispute with the inducted candidate, that the Governor might or would have decided not to be entitled to the office. This bears upon both branches of the consideration. First, upon your assumption of your powers from your having a general duty; second, upon the consideration of whether a duty assigned to the Governor, as of his official transaction ministerially, will not be compelled always, as in other cases, to resort to justice to try the foundation of the discussion of the writ in the courts of justice. I find in this act of 1877 no such purpose in the arrangement of powers as to make it a court under the Constitution. I find no appointment of these Judges to this court under the powers of the Constitution. I find no means for writs and for subpœnas provided by the learned counsel that we might introduce evidence that Mr. Humphreys had resigned. The interposition of this objection was a surprise to us, for it was a matter of inquiry before the Florida State Canvassing Board on the 4th day of December, 1876, antecedent to their final and conclusive canvass. Mr. Humphreys's resignation Field assigned to you what he described as powers at least as great as that of a court on a quo warranto, and of course in that nature Mr. Merrick claimed the same. Judge Black did not in terms do so; yet in assigning the nature and the searching character of the transaction to be executed, gave it that character, and implied that demand, and the brief handed in (in the appraise of which I am happy to join with the learned associates of Mr. Green,) makes the claim distinctly that you are not adequate as a reviewing canvassing board, but must have the powers of a court on a quo warranto. And why this claim of anything less magnificent and anything less intolerable could have been found sufficient in the area for your action as desired is because in the methods and machinery of elections, as he insists, the steps are onward of the primary Boards, and if you make a superior Canvassing Board to determine whether Gov. Stearns' certificate, to the effect that those Electors were appointed is valid, and you are nothing but a Returning Board, surmounting the final Returning Board to see whether their return justifies that certificate, that at once you find that it does not, that the de facto title and possession is complete, and that nothing but a jurisdiction that consists of de facto title and possession can begin—can find the case for beginning the consideration of the question of right. This quo warranto suit, if it becomes a subject of evidence, is a matter of evidence that declares absolutely on the petition of the Tilden Electors that the Hayes Electors are in possession of the faculty, the office, (or what not it may be,) and are exercising it, and they ask that an inquiry may then proceed in due course of law, bringing them in only by process on the 18th of December, long after their vote, to inquire whether that possession and that exercise as matter of right between them and the Hayes Electors is or is not according to law and truth. The Commission will be good enough to look at an act, not reprinted in the little collection of acts so usefully laid before us, (and naturally not to be reprinted in that,) an act which otherwise may escape attention, or take some labor to find. It is the act of Feb. 11, 1873, in the laws of Florida, (session laws, page 28,) in relation to the proceedings on writs of quo warranto. The general statutes that you find in the collection exclude any possible writ of quo warranto, except by the States through the act of the Attorney General, and this quo warranto reported here begins by evidence that the Attorney General refused to bring the writ for the State. That led to an inquiry how it happened that it was brought, and I found this law, which I will briefly state, as providing to this effect, that when the Attorney General refused, then claimants may make themselves relators and use the name of the State, but that that shall be a mere private suit that shall be good between the parties and not affect the public or the State. It is in terms so provided, and it is provided that the judgment shall not be a bar to the suit by the Attorney General in the public right. So much to explain that situation.

FLORIDA LAWS ON THE CASE.

Now, there is but one other point to which I wish to call the attention of the Commission. In the legislation of Florida—for I can spend no time to rehearse the statutes—on page 53 of this pamphlet, which has been printed for the use of the Commission, there were found, sections 31 and 32, one, a provision that the Secretary of State shall make and transmit to each person chosen to any State office immediately after the canvass, showing that the canvass, as completed, is the basis of the State's authentication of the right of every State officer, "a certificate showing the number of the votes cast for each person, which certificate shall be prima facie evidence of his election to such office." That gives him the office. Subsequent inquiry, is as to the right. Section 32 says: "When any person shall be elected to the office of Elector of President and Vice President or Representative in Congress, the Governor shall make out, sign, and cause to be sealed with the seal of the State, and transmitted to such person, a certificate of his election." That is the State's final determination of the man that has been appointed Elector under the Constitution of the United States. Have these contestants any such authentication of the right, and have they proposed any such evidence of their title on the 6th of December? And the question of completeness of the warrant of the Hayes Electors to attend and discharge their duty but robed the vote, when cast, with the complete qualifications under the State laws and the State authority of the vote? We have the Governor's certificate (as he is the very man that passed, for the State, on that question, which furnishes the right to meet and act) that this is the list of men that were appointed. These certificates under the State law form no part of the return to the President of the Senate, but when the same Governor executes, under Federal law, the same duty under the same evidence, we have the certificate without the production of the antecedent one. Now we come, under a pretty brief period of discussion, to the general doctrine as to what the powers and what the arrangement and disposition of those powers are, under the Constitution of the United States, in the transaction of choosing a President. In the first place, the only transaction of choosing a President begins with the deposit, so to speak, in the Federal office, of the votes of certain persons named and described in the Constitution as "Electors." From the moment of that deposit the sealed vote lies protected against retraction or corruption in the depository provided for it, the possession of the Federal officers in the Federal offices. The next step after that is the opening of those votes and their counting, and that succeeds the deposit of the votes by the Electors, and relates to their getting the qualifications which the act of Congress prescribes. Those qualifications are nothing but appointments by the States, and beyond that the act of Congress and the Federal Constitution, with due regard to the State authority, does not intrude. It has provided, under a rule of prudence, that they shall be appointed on the same day in all the States; it has provided that they meet and cast their votes on the same day; the latter is the method, term, and prescribed date in the transaction of voting for President; the other is the only intrusion upon State authority in the absolute choice of time and manner of appointment, that Congress may prescribe the time, and Congress has prescribed it. Now, what are we to gather in respect to the stage of the contradiction of witnesses and discussion as to the effect of testimony.

THE STATE'S RECORD OF ITS ELECTION FINAL.

Now, Mr. Commissioner Thurman asks the question: Suppose the Electoral return, when opened, discloses the fact that the four Electors then present were members of Congress, and had been at the time of the appointment? These certificates under the State law form no part of the return to the President of the Senate, but when the same Governor executes, under Federal law, the same duty under the same evidence, we have the certificate without the production of the antecedent one. Now we come, under a pretty brief period of discussion, to the general doctrine as to what the powers and what the arrangement and disposition of those powers are, under the Constitution of the United States, in the transaction of choosing a President. In the first place, the only transaction of choosing a President begins with the deposit, so to speak, in the Federal office, of the votes of certain persons named and described in the Constitution as "Electors." From the moment of that deposit the sealed vote lies protected against retraction or corruption in the depository provided for it, the possession of the Federal officers in the Federal offices. The next step after that is the opening of those votes and their counting, and that succeeds the deposit of board in 1873; there was a vacancy on the board in 1875 and 1876, caused by the resignation in 1875 of the Democratic member; it was never filled; Dr. Kennedy's name was suggested by a letter from members of the Democratic Party; does not know who laid the letter before the board; does not know whether this was done before or after the canvass commenced; the first meeting the board had regarding the late election was on Nov. 16 or 17; did not believe they began the canvass until Nov. 19 or 20; thinks the receipt of the letter suggesting Dr. Kennedy's name was mentioned in the minutes; [on looking over a printed copy of the minutes handed the witness by Mr. Field, he said he could not find any mention of the letter;] he did not know what Wells said when he presented the letter; did not know anything about Dr. Kennedy's standing in New-Orleans; he did not know as a fact that the reason why Kennedy was not elected was because the Republican members of the Board did not want a Democrat to watch them; did not think it part of his duty to propose Kennedy's election to fill the vacancy; the Visiting Committees were present at all the deliberations and meetings of the board except at the secret sessions; in those the disputed cases were settled, the returns compiled, and the results declared; witness' construction of the language of the resolution of the board inviting these committees "to be present at the canvassing, compiling, and declaring the result of the returns" was in consonance with the action of the board in excluding them from the secret sessions; had no recollection of the United States Supervisor being refused permission to be present; in the secret sessions Gen. Anderson and Mr. Kenner generally did the figuring; Mr. Kenner kept a memorandum of the secret sessions for himself and witness; he stated that, in rejecting any precinct or poll, they acted upon the evidence before them; is positive that there were affidavits or a protest from the Supervisor in the case of either West or East Baton Rouge; witness was asked that he would know affidavits were before the board in executive session, but he could not remember whether 500 or 10,000 precincts were thrown out

THE RESULT UNKNOWN.

Q.—As the returns came in first, were the returns for the Hayes or the Tilden Electors? A.—I really cannot remember.

Q.—Had you any conversation, during the time the returns were canvassed, with anybody regarding the majority? A.—With nobody in the world.

Q.—And you did not know anything in the world the result of the election until after the canvass was completed? A.—No, Sir.

Witness stated that they completed the canvass for Presidential Electors on Dec. 6, but then corrected himself and said that he did not remember the date, he believed it was in January; it was about 9 o'clock in the morning, all four members were present, and he thought the return was signed by all.

Q.—Did you open the returns in secret session? A.—Yes—no; we had one paper in secret session—the what you may call it? I forget the name. It was only one paper—the contabulated statement—the whole of it.

Q.—In whose handwriting was this? A.—In that of the Supervisor.

Q.—What Supervisor? A.—The Supervisor of Elections.

Mr. Burchard—He means the consolidated statement.

The Witness—That's it; that's what I mean. When I said contabulated I meant consolidated.

Q.—What has become of that paper? A.—I do not know what you mean by that.

Q.—What was done with these statements? A.—They were given back to the clerks, and finally filed in the office of the Secretary of State. The witness stated that he did not know any instance in which affidavits regarding any returns came in after these returns had been received, nor in which returns were thrown out without any protests or affidavits. He remembered nothing about the returns from the parish of Ouachita, nor about a letter from the Supervisor there transmitting Elias Pinkston's tesdimony, and saying that he had received it too late for filing it with the other testimony accompanying his returns. Mr. Casanave was interrogated concerning the original return from Vernon Parish, and stated that he did not believe the word "compiled" written on the same was in Mr. Casanave's handwriting. The word "compiled" indicated that the return was passed upon.

Q.—Look at the paper marked "A" and the black lines opposite the Parish of Vernon, and explain how it is that there are three precincts thrown out, when the original return had been accepted as correct? A.—I know nothing at all about that.

Q.—Well that looks as if some fraud had been committed, does it not? A.—Yes, Sir.

Q.—Do you know who had to do with that fraud? A.—I do not.

Q.—Now look again at the original return and see whether you can tell where it has been altered? A.—I cannot see where it has been.

Q.—Look at the paper marked "B" and see how many votes were cast for the Hayes Electors in Vernon Parish. A.—Two votes for six, and one vote for two of the Electors.

Q.—Now look at the paper marked "C" and see how on that, the final return, the vote stands. A.—There are 170 votes for three, and 108 votes for the other Electors.

Q.—That shows another fraud does it not? A.—That paper shows a fraud.

Mr. Burchard—You do not know anything about the correctness of these papers? A.—I do not.

Q.—You never saw them before? A.—I have not, sir. Lawrence—You don't mean to say that a fraud was committed? A.—No, Sir; I know nothing about the matter.

Q.—Do you know anything about a transfer of votes in Vernon Parish? A.—I do not,

DAVID DUDLEY FIELD REBUKED.

Discussion arose in regard to printing the testimony by the committee, when Mr. Lawrence said—I have no objection to the testimony so far as we have it being printed for the use of the committee; but I shall object to the general printing until we have all of it. And now I wish to say this: We are a committee to inquire into the powers and privileges of the House. I think it might be well to inquire into the powers and privileges of the committee. Here is a pamphlet containing a stenographer's report of the testimony of this committee in the Florida case, and printed by Judd & Detwiler, private printers of this city. I want to say that no member or officer of this committee has any right to give any testimony to outside parties for publication, and doing so is a gross and palpable violation of the rules governing committees.

Mr. Field—Why, you have given access to members of the press to our meetings, have you not?

Mr. Burchard—Yes; to report what they hear.

Mr. Field—Well, can't they report every word, if they see fit?

Mr. Lawrence—Does anybody know how this pamphlet came to be printed?

Several members of the committee—This is the first I have seen of it. At this point the committee deemed it advisable to have a private conference, and the room was accordingly cleared.

GOV. WELLS' TESTIMONY.

When the doors were reopened, Gov. Wells, of the Returning Board, was put upon the stand and examined by Judge Lawrence. He handed to Gov. Wells the brief note to Maddox, of Nov. 20, and asked him to state what led to the writing of this note. The witness said—Before answering this question I should like to ask the Committee that a letter of about four pages, written by Mr. Maddox himself, commendatory of his conduct as an officer, and addressed to the President of the United States, and signed by me, be produced, because this note stands in connection with that letter. Mr. Lawrence then handed the witness the letters written by the latter to Maddox, and the one to Senator West, and requested him to make any explanation he might desire concerning them.

At this point Mr. Maddox entered the room, and was asked to produce the letter referred to by Wells as having been written by Maddox himself, but denied having such a letter or having ever written such a one. Mr. Wells then said: I met with Maddox in this city about two or three years ago; did not meet him again until Nov. 19, when he came to my room in New-Orleans and told me that he was an agent of the Government, and sent down there to look into the political situation; he asked me for my views; said that he had had a good deal of conversation with persons of both parties; that the people were a good deal exasperated against me and against the Packard Government, and would not submit to its ruling if it were sustained; I told him if that were so he ought to go at once to Washington; I told him I was glad of it; he then laid down before me a long letter addressed to the President, and commendatory of his conduct as an officer, which he requested me to sign, and I did so; he then asked me to write a further letter, giving a description of the condition of affairs; this I declined to do, but told him I would give him a note, giving him the entree in Washington; his note did not satisfy him, and then I wrote the other letter of credentials; he then withdrew from the room, saying he was going that afternoon at 5 o'clock; the next morning Mr. Maddox entered my room, and when I expressed my surprise at seeing him, he said that he had not been able to get off the afternoon previous; I then wrote the letter to Senator West, and gave it to him, saying that I had intended to send it by mail; the witness said he wrote the letter while the room was full of persons; Maddox then withdraw, and witness saw no more of him until the 7th of December, when he returned and said he was going up Red River; Maddox came back a day or two afterward, and immediately on entering the room told witness he wanted to purchase a certain plantation and make Louisiana his home; he asked witness to see the owner, a Mr. Harris, in regard to its price, &c.; witness had not seen Maddox from that time until his [witness'] arrival here.

MADDOX'S TESTIMONY CONTRADICTED.

Q.—State what, if anything, you said to Mr. Maddox in relation to procuring money, or anything else of value, for you or other members of the Returning Board of Louisiana, in order to declare the result of the election either in favor of the Republican candidates or the Democratic candidates? A.—I had no conversation with Mr. Maddox upon that subject; none whatever.

Q.—Did he say anything to you? Witness—In regard to it?

Q.—In regard to procuring money or anything of value for you or any member of the Board? A.—He did not, Sir.

Q.—Did you say to him in any form, or intimate in any form, that you desired him to procure money or any thing of value for you or any member of the board? A.—I did not, Sir.

Q.—Did he say anything about the Democrats having, or intending to use money to procure a declaration of the results of the election? A.—He did not, Sir; I will tell you that when it comes up, and I will give it from a very responsible source—a man who is worth a million and a half of dollars.

Q.—State if he said anything about a desire to be appointed to New-Orleans as an agent of the Treasury Department? A.—That was his intention, Sir; he said that he desired to do so, but did not fix a time for his change of position from here to New-Orleans.

Q.—What did he say, if anything, as to his object in procuring these first two letters about which you have testified? Q.—To put the real condition of the sentiments of the people of Louisiana in possession of the President.

Q.—You have said that he wrote a long letter and requested you to sign it? A.—Yes, Sir.

Q.—Did you read it before you signed it, and, if so, what you did with it? A.—I signed the letter, and Mr. Maddox folded it up, put it in an envelope, and took the letter himself; its superscription was in his own handwriting; he addressed it to the President himself; I have never seen the letter; Mr. Maddox read it to me.

Q.—What was the substance and object of it, if you can state? A.—The substance and object of the letter—

Mr. Field—The substance and object are two different things.

The Witness—I cannot tell the object; I will tell you the substance; the substance was commendatory of himself as a public officer.

Mr. Lawrence—Did he state what his object was? A.—He then stated his object was, if he was favorably received and things were all right, that he would try to get himself transferred from Washington to New-Orleans.

Q.—Did he state why he desired to be so transferred? A.—I don't think he did, Sir.

Q.—Are you acquainted with C. M. Calvert, No. 170 Custom-house street, New-Orleans? A.—I am, Sir.

Q.—What relation, if any, does he now, or did he at any time during the last year, sustain toward you? A.—Well, Sir, in the election of 1876 Mr. Calvert was in the Parish of Rapides in getting the people to polling places; Mr. Calvert himself is a Democrat, and voted for Mr. Tilden and Mr. Hendricks, and for Mr. Nicholls and Mr. Witts, but he voted the parish ticket for the Republican Party.

THE SUBJECT OF PROCURING MONEY.

Q.—Here is a telegram taken from the testimony of Mr. Pickett: "C. M. Calvert, No. 170 Custom-house street, New-Orleans. Hold; will telegraph you Monday evening. JOSEPH HANCOCK." Did you ever see the first original telegram? A.—I never did.

Q.—Did you ever hear of it until it was disclosed in the testimony here? A.—I never did.

Q.—Did you have any conversation with Mr. Calvert in relation to it? A.—I never did.

Q.—Did you have any conversation with him on the subject of procuring money? A.—No, Sir.

Q.—Did he act in any capacity as your friend to procure money or other thing of value? A.—He did not, Sir.

Q.—Did you have any arrangement or understanding with him that Mr. Maddox should telegraph to him for you, either over his own name, or over the name of Joseph Hancock, or any other name? A.—Mr. Maddox, in leaving my office after writing this note to Mr. West, stated it his business was received or he was received properly at Washington, that he would telegraph me back that it was all right; I referred to Mr. Maddox that I wanted (the board was then just commencing its labor,) I wanted no communication by telegraph, or anything else during the meetings and operations of the board; I received no telegrams whatever; Mr. Calvert, I think, received a telegram from Mr. Maddox that all was right, implying that his application—

Mr. Field—Do not say what was implied, because I think we can do that as well as you.

The Witness—Very well, Sir.

Mr. Lawrence—Did you see the telegram? A.—I did not.

Q.—What was the arrangement with Mr. Maddox about telegraphing that "all was right?" A.—If he was successful in his moves in regard to going to the City of New-Orleans as a Government officer.

Q.—Did you have any arrangement with Mr. Calvert that he was to deliver any telegram to you? A.—None, Sir, none; nothing more than to tell me the result of Mr. Maddox's telegram, that he might receive.

Q.—Did you have any knowledge was there any correspondence or conference with Mr. Pickett in relation to procuring money? A.—I never knew Mr. Pickett—never saw him—never heard of him until I saw his testimony; I didn't know that there was a man by that name in existence.

Q.—After Maddox returned to New-Orleans did he give you to understand that he had been in conference or correspondence with anybody in relation to procuring money to affect the result of the election? A.—He did not, Sir.

Q.—Did he give you any information that he made any effort to procure money for you or for any member of the board? A.—He did not, Sir.

Q.—Did you have any knowledge that Mr. Pickett or Mr. Maddox was telegraphing or corresponding on that subject? A.—Not at all, Sir, not the slightest in the world.

Q.—Who is Col. F. C. Zacharie, of New-Orleans? A.—He is a lawyer there, Sir.

Q.—A Democrat or a Republican? A.—He is a Democrat, Sir.

Q.—Did you have any information of any telegram sent to him by Mr. Pickett? A.—None, Sir, whatever.

Q.—Here is a telegram:

WASAINGTON, Dec. 1.
1,330 NEW-YORK AVENUE.

Col. F. C. Zacharie, New-Orleans:

A double game, but if well informed you might trust person I wrote about. JOHN T. PICKETT.

Did you ever see or hear of that telegram until it was produced in testimony before this committee? A.—I never did, Sir.

Q.—Here is a telegram:

Joseph Hancock, No. 131 Bienville street, New-Orleans: Telegraph as desired; damn my interests; think of the best interests of forty millions of people.
JOHN T. PICKETT.

THE MEETING WITH MADDOX.

Did you know that such a telegram as that was sent to Mr. Maddox under the name of "Joseph Hancock" or any other person until it was produced in evidence here? A.—Never; I never heard of it.

Q.—Did you ever request Mr. Maddox or any person to negotiate, or confer, or correspond with any person in relation to procuring money or other thing of value, for you or any other member of the Returning Board? A.—I never did, Sir.

Q.—How many times had you seen Mr. Maddox before you wrote these two letters that have been put in evidence? A.—I saw Mr. Maddox [Saturday evening, the 13th day of November; I left my plantation on the 13th of November, and arrived in New-Orleans on the evening of the 15th or the morning of the 16th; I appeared at court and was sworn into office the morning of the 17th; the board met, but the rooms were small, and we adjourned over to meet on Saturday, the 18th; we met on the 18th and passed resolutions, introduced by Mr. Anderson, inviting five of the gentlemen who had gone there on each side to witness the canvassing of the vote; the board adjourned about 3 o'clock in the afternoon, and that evening after returning from my dinner, where I generally took my meals, at the City Hotel, some eight or 10 blocks off from where my room was, Mr. Maddox came in, and that, as I said before, was the first time I had seen him in three years, and I did not see him again until Monday, the 20th, when I wrote these letters, with the exception of the letter to Senator West, which is dated the 21st, and was written on Tuesday; I intended to have sent that letter by mail; but, as I said, Mr. Maddox appeared in my office, and I remarked that I was astonished, that I thought he had gone, but that I was glad he was there, and would write the letter to send by him.

Q.—How long had you been acquainted with Mr. Maddox? A.—I think my first acquaintance with him was about 1847; he was a soldier in the Mexican War, and was disbanded, I think; and having a large connection of people living in Rapides, he remained there and married there; I think it was in 1847 or 1848.

Q.—When Maddox returned to New-Orleans from Washington did he tell you that he had not delivered the letter which you addressed to Senator West? A.—He did not, Sir.

Q.—Did you express to him at any time your satisfaction that he had not delivered the letter? A.—I did not, Sir.

Q.—Did he say anything about what he had done with the letter to Senator West, or did you inquire of him? A.—I did not inquire, I presumed that it was delivered.

Q.—Did you have any conversation with Maddox the evening before these two letters of Nov. 20 were written? A. I did not, Sir; that was Sunday, 19th; Saturday, the 18th, after the adjournment of the board, I went to dinner; I met a gentleman at the stairway as I was going into my dinner; he said to me that he wanted to have a conference with me; that we were both old citizens of the State, and he hoped that Louisianians would work together, and when could he have an interview; I stated to him that I was very busy and engaged with the board, and I could not fix a time that afternoon; it was impossible for me to do so, and I therefore could not say when I could give him this interview; says he, "Can't you come to my office to-morrow," (which was Sunday,) "at 10 o'clock?" I told him I had an engagement to go out to the park (which is some two or three miles from the city) and dine with a friend; that I did not know whether I could do it or not, but I presumed I might; that I would not leave my room until about 12 or 1 o'clock to go out to dinner; "Well," says he, "won't you come at 10 o'clock, that will give you ample time, and you can then fill your engagement Sunday evening?" I told him, "Certainly, Sir, I will go; will meet you at your office;" on Sunday morning, after taking my breakfast at 10 o'clock, I repaired to the gentleman's office and had a conference with him, until about noon, when I retired to my room and there met the carriage of the gentleman, which I entered, was driven off, spent the day, and did not return until 10 o'clock at night; I had no conversation with Maddox from Saturday until Monday.

Q.—Did you see him on the evening of the 19th at all? A.—I did not; I could not have seen him; I was three miles from the city.

Q.—When he came to your office on the morning of the 20th, had you written either of these letters? A.—Not one, Sir; I wrote them right there; the room was filled with gentlemen; I had but an hour or two to stay; I had to repair to the office to commence our labors at about 10 or 10:30 o'clock, and I had only from about 8:30 until that time to transact my office business, and I sat down and wrote this letter.

Q.—Did you say to him that you wanted $1,000,000, or any other sum of money? A.—No, sir, I did not.

Q.—Did you request that Maddox should proceed to Washington? A.—I did not; he suggested it himself, and I told him I thought it was his duty as an officer to appraise the Government of what he believed to be the condition of things there; that I felt myself that things were not altogether right, from what I saw and from my intercourse with people.

PERSECUTED AS A UNION MAN.

Q.—Did you say to him that you wanted to serve your party, but did not want to run the risk unless you were compensated for it, or any language of that import? A.—No, Sir; I have been a Union man from 1859 to the present time; I passed through the whole war, persecuted as a Union man; I never flinched from my position when I was surrounded with the Confederate soldiers who were pursuing me for my life, and I certainly would not tell Mr. Maddox to procure a sum of money for me to stand firm to the principles which I had entertained before the commencement of the rebellion.

Q.—Did you say to him that the vote was "very heavy" for you to handle? A.—I did not, Sir.

Q.—That if it had been smaller you might have accomplished the desired result by throwing out New-Orleans? A.—I did not, Sir.

Q.—Was any part of the vote of New-Orleans thrown out? A.—Not to my knowledge; not by action of the board. If it was, it must have been by other parties.

Q.—Was there any proposition before the board to throw out New-Orleans? A.—Yes, Sir; there was a proposition, but it was a proposition in a protest of the counting of the naturalized votes, and I gave the attorneys on each side an hour to discuss the question, and after the discussion I concluded, or the board concluded, that they had not power to do it.

Q.—Was there any proposition to throw out the entire vote of the City of New-Orleans? A.—None, Sir.

Q.—Did you say to Mr. Maddox that he should come on to Washington and see influential men, and get protection and the money you wanted, or anything of similar import? A.—No, Sir; I merely said to Mr. Maddox that I would be very glad if he would make a statement of the condition of things when he got there, and he said that was his object and he intended to do so; that he had been sent down for that purpose.

Q.—On the 20th of November had these gentlemen, who represented the Republican and Democratic parties from the North, Senator Sherman, and others, on each side—(interrupting)—Yes, Sir; they were there; they must have arrived about the Thursday prior to that, which would have been about the 15th or 16th, and as I have stated, on Saturday resolutions were offered to permit these gentlemen to come before the board, and letters were directed to them apprising them of the action of the board in regard thereto.

Q.—Had you any facts to induce you to suppose that Democrats intended to use money in procuring testimony and counsel, and other things to be used before the board with a view to present the Democratic side of the question as strongly as possible? A.—That had been done; they were there, Sir, using it; they appeared before the board.

HOW DEMOCRATS USED MONEY.

Q.—Do you know whether money was expended in employing counsel and procuring testimony? A.—Let the question your question; does that apply to any of the gentlemen who were there, or the attorneys in the city?

Q.—To the attorneys in the city. A.—I do not know the workings of the Democratic Party of the City of New-Orleans in regard to these things, but I presume money—

Mr. Field—(interrupting)—I beg you will not say what you presume.

Mr. Lawrence—State how it was commonly reported. A.—It was generally believed that money was there.

Q.—It was generally believed, on or prior to the 20th of November, that the Democrats were using money in the employment of counsel and procuring of testimony with a view to the presentation of the Democratic side of the question as strongly as possible to the board? A.—I presume so, Sir.

Q.—State whether, in consequence of that, the Republicans also employed counsel and expended money in procuring testimony? A.—They did, Sir; I will qualify that by stating that the attorney for the board, John Ray, was feed (he has got his money yet, but he has the promise of it,) to attend to the interests of the Republican party; what the other attorneys charged, or whether they charged anything, I do not know.

Q.—There were lawyers employed on both sides? A.—On both sides.

Q.—And both sides took testimony? A.—Yes, Sir; both sides took testimony.

Q.—All of which required the expenditure of money? A.—Yes, Sir; necessarily so.

Q.—And you deemed it important that the leading Republicans in Washington should understand the situation? A.—Yes, Sir.

Q.—Well, was there any discussion on any form between you and Maddox in relation to a resignation of any of the Republican members of the board? A.—None, Sir.

Q.—Was it as a means of enabling the Democrats to get in and control the board, or otherwise? A.—No, Sir.

Q.—Did you have any understanding with Mr. Maddox prior to the time he left New-Orleans as to what the word "hold" should mean if he should telegraph that to New-Orleans to anybody? A.—Not a syllable, Sir.

Q.—Were you furnished with, or did you know of the existance of any cypher by which telegraphing was to be done? A.—No, Sir.

Q.—Did you say to Mr. Maddox that you wanted at least $200,000 for yourself, and a similar sum for Mr. Anderson? A.—No, Sir.

GENTLEMEN—NOT "NIGGERS."

Q.—Any a smaller amount for the "niggers?" A.—No, Sir; I never use the word "nigger" to the gentlemen who are with me on the board; I do not consider them niggers; they are colored people, and they are gentlemen.

Q.—Have you been in the habit of using that expression—"niggers"? A.—No, Sir. I have not since the war; I used to use it when I owned them, but they are now citizens, and I treat them as such.

Q.—Did Maddox say to you in New-Orleans or elsewhere that the negotiations in New-York had failed? A.—He did not, Sir.

Q.—Did he say anything to you upon the subject of the negotiations? A.—Not at all, Sir; he never did.

Q.—Did you say to Mr. Maddox at noon of the 6th of December, or about that time, that the majority for the Hayes Electors would be about 1,200 to 1,800? A.—I have no recollection of any conversation with Mr. Maddox on that subject either before or after the 6th; but I will state this, that on the evening of the 5th the board had arrived at its conclusion, and on the morning of the 6th the promulgations of the election were made in the public papers of New-Orleans, and the result of the election could have been known to Mr. Maddox on on the 8th, in the morning, and would have been known to him as having been 3,400 or 3,500 for Mr. Hayes.

Q.—Did you have a key to any cipher, so that you might understand dispatches that should be sent to you by Mr. Maddox or any other person? A.—I did not, Sir.

Q.—Did you have any conversation with Mr. Maddox in relation to a cipher or key to a cipher? A.—I did not, Sir, more than what I stated a while ago; that if he was successful and sent his telegram to Mr. Calvert in regard to his own affairs that it was all right; it was all right I supposed.

Q.—Were you acquainted with the Adjutant General of Louisiana? A.—P. Jack Wharton?

Q.—Jack? A.—Yes, Sir; I know him very well.

Q.—Did he ever tell you he had possession of those letters or any of them? A.—He never did, Sir.

Q.—Did you have any knowledge that he had them? A.—I never had, Sir; I was frequently in the room where he lodges.

Q.—Did you ever make any inquiry as to what had become of those letters? A.—I never did, Sir.

Q.—Did you ever have any conversation with Senator West in relation to the use of money to effect the result of the election? A.—I never did, Sir.

Q.—Or with regard to obtaining money for yourself or any member of the board? A.—I never did.

LIBERTIES OF AN AMERICAN CITIZEN.

Q.—Were any or the returns from Vernon Parish burned in your presence, or with your knowledge? A.—With due regard to the committee and to the Chairman of the committee, I will state that I am not willing to be catechised upon any of the results of the election, with the exception of Vernon Parish, until I have been discharged of the contempt charged upon me before the House and my liberties as an American freeman are allowed me; I will go on in order to place before the committee everything in relation to Vernon Parish that I know, but outside of that, in regard to the election, I must decline most respectfully until the punishment which I have been adjudged shall have been carried out or I shall have been relieved of it. Now, Sir, I am ready to answer your question.

Q.—You may state whether polls two and nine, or any other polls from Vernon Parish, were burned or otherwise destroyed in your presence or with your knowledge? A.—None, Sir, whatever; and the man who has sworn to it is an unmitigated liar. Pardon, gentlemen; I don't mean to offend the feelings of the committee, but the outrage upon my rights excites me, and, as a matter of course, it brings from me language which, perhaps, I ought not to use before this body.

Q.—Did you make any request or give any direction for the destruction, in any form, of any paper returned to the board? A.—I never did, Sir.

Q.—Or any paper relating to the elections? A.—I never did, Sir.

Q.—Did you have any knowledge of the destruction of any? A.—I did not; I will make a statement now in connection with that matter; the compiled returns by the Supervisor of Registration of the Parish of Vernon was transmitted—a single sheet—to the Returning Board by mail, a route of 400 miles; it was opened in the presence of the gentlemen who were there from the North for the purpose of witnessing the count; there was but a single paper in that return, the compiled statement from the Supervisor of Registration; there was a general protest by all of the Hayes Electors, and I think other protests, but there was no poll list or tally sheet from Vernon; there were no such documents returned, and therefore none to be burned.

Mr. Lawrence here called the attention of the witness to the Senate document containing the letter of Senator Sherman to the President, and the accompanying proceedings of the Returning Board confirming the statement that there was no tally sheet received from Vernon Parish.

In response to further questions the witness testified: I am not acquainted with Littlefield; I never saw him until the 20th of November; I did not know his name for a week after he was a Clerk for the board; I never have spoken 12 words to him in my life; I never requested or, directed him to make an alteration in the return from Vernon Parish, or any other, and never had any conversation with him about his duties as Clerk. The committee then took a recess.

A RECESS TAKEN.

Upon the reassembling of the committee, at 3:20 P. M., Gov. Wells was cross-examined by Mr. Field as follows:

Q.—Look at the letter to Senator West, and say whether it is in your handwriting. A.—Yes, Sir, that is in my handwriting.

Q.—Where did you write it? A.—I wrote it in the City of New-Orleans.

Q.—In what part of it? A.—In the Custom-house, in my office.

Q.—Was it dictated to you by anybody? A.—Nobody, Sir.

Q.—Was it suggested to you by anybody? A.—It was not, Sir.

Mr. Field—Look at it if you please, and direct your attention to the first paragraph: "I regret much not seeing you when here. I wanted to say much to you which would be at least imprudent to put upon paper." What was it that you wished to say which would be imprudent to put upon paper? A.—Nothing pertaining to the subject matter before this committee.

Q.—Then what was it? A.—It was this: I was a friend of Senator West, and I was anxious to have him re-elected to the Senate, and there was a combination of my own party to defeat him, and I did not propose to insert in that letter the names of parties who were opposed to him.

Q.—Was any part of the vote of New-Orleans thrown out? A.—Not to my knowledge; not by action of the board. If it was, it must have been by other parties.

Q.—Was there any proposition before the board to throw out New-Orleans? A.—Yes, Sir; there was a proposition, but it was a proposition in a protest of the counting of the naturalized votes, and I gave the attorneys on each side an hour to discuss the question, and after the discussion I concluded, or the board concluded, that they had not power to do it.

Q.—Was there any proposition to throw out the entire vote of the City of New-Orleans? A.—None, Sir.

Q.—Did you say to Mr. Maddox that he should come on to Washington and see influential men, and get protection and the money you wanted, or anything of similar import? A.—No, Sir; I merely said to Mr. Maddox that I would be very glad if he would make a statement of the condition of things when he got there, and he said that was his object and he intended to do so; that he had been sent down for that purpose.

Q.—On the 20th of November had these gentlemen, who represented the Republican and Democratic parties from the North, Senator Sherman, and others, on each side—(interrupting)—Yes, Sir; they were there; they must have arrived about the Thursday prior to that, which would have been about the 15th or 16th, and as I have stated, on Saturday resolutions were offered to permit these gentlemen to come before the board, and letters were directed to them apprising them of the action of the board in regard thereto.

Q.—Had you any facts to induce you to suppose that Democrats intended to use money in procuring testimony and counsel, and other things to be used before the board with a view to present the Democratic side of the question as strongly as possible? A.—That had been done; they were there, Sir, using it; they appeared before the board.

HOW DEMOCRATS USED MONEY.

Q.—Do you know whether money was expended in employing counsel and procuring testimony? A.—Let the question your question; does that apply to any of the gentlemen who were there, or the attorneys in the city?

Q.—To the attorneys in the city. A.—I do not know the workings of the Democratic Party of the City of New-Orleans in regard to these things, but I presume money—

Mr. Field—(interrupting)—I beg you will not say what you presume.

Mr. Lawrence—State how it was commonly reported. A.—It was generally believed that money was there.

Q.—It was generally believed, on or prior to the 20th of November, that the Democrats were using money in the employment of counsel and procuring of testimony with a view to the presentation of the Democratic side of the question as strongly as possible to the board? A.—I presume so, Sir.

Q.—State whether, in consequence of that, the Republicans also employed counsel and expended money in procuring testimony? A.—They did, Sir; I will qualify that by stating that the attorney for the board, John Ray, was feed (he has got his money yet, but he has the promise of it,) to attend to the interests of the Republican party; what the other attorneys charged, or whether they charged anything, I do not know.

Q.—There were lawyers employed on both sides? A.—On both sides.

Q.—And both sides took testimony? A.—Yes, Sir; both sides took testimony.

Q.—All of which required the expenditure of money? A.—Yes, Sir; necessarily so.

Q.—And you deemed it important that the leading Republicans in Washington should understand the situation? A.—Yes, Sir.

Q.—Well, was there any discussion on any form between you and Maddox in relation to a resignation of any of the Republican members of the board? A.—None, Sir.

Q.—Was it as a means of enabling the Democrats to get in and control the board, or otherwise? A.—No, Sir.

Q.—Did you have any understanding with Mr. Maddox prior to the time he left New-Orleans as to what the word "hold" should mean if he should telegraph that to New-Orleans to anybody? A.—Not a syllable, Sir.

Q.—Were you furnished with, or did you know of the existance of any cypher by which telegraphing was to be done? A.—No, Sir.

Q.—Did you say to Mr. Maddox that you wanted at least $200,000 for yourself, and a similar sum for Mr. Anderson? A.—No, Sir.

GENTLEMEN—NOT "NIGGERS."

Q.—Any a smaller amount for the "niggers?" A.—No, Sir; I never use the word "nigger" to the gentlemen who are with me on the board; I do not consider them niggers; they are colored people, and they are gentlemen.

Q.—Have you been in the habit of using that expression—"niggers"? A.—No, Sir. I have not since the war; I used to use it when I owned them, but they are now citizens, and I treat them as such.

Q.—Did Maddox say to you in New-Orleans or elsewhere that the negotiations in New-York had failed? A.—He did not, Sir.

Q.—Did he say anything to you upon the subject of the negotiations? A.—Not at all, Sir; he never did.

Q.—Did you say to Mr. Maddox at noon of the 6th of December, or about that time, that the majority for the Hayes Electors would be about 1,200 to 1,800? A.—I have no recollection of any conversation with Mr. Maddox on that subject either before or after the 6th; but I will state this, that on the evening of the 5th the board had arrived at its conclusion, and on the morning of the 6th the promulgations of the election were made in the public papers of New-Orleans, and the result of the election could have been known to Mr. Maddox on on the 8th, in the morning, and would have been known to him as having been 3,400 or 3,500 for Mr. Hayes.

Q.—Did you have a key to any cipher, so that you might understand dispatches that should be sent to you by Mr. Maddox or any other person? A.—I did not, Sir.

Q.—Did you have any conversation with Mr. Maddox in relation to a cipher or key to a cipher? A.—I did not, Sir, more than what I stated a while ago; that if he was successful and sent his telegram to Mr. Calvert in regard to his own affairs that it was all right; it was all right I supposed.

Q.—Were you acquainted with the Adjutant General of Louisiana? A.—P. Jack Wharton?

Q.—Jack? A.—Yes, Sir; I know him very well.

Q.—Did he ever tell you he had possession of those letters or any of them? A.—He never did, Sir.

Q.—Did you have any knowledge that he had them? A.—I never had, Sir; I was frequently in the room where he lodges.

Q.—Did you ever make any inquiry as to what had become of those letters? A.—I never did, Sir.

Q.—Did you ever have any conversation with Senator West in relation to the use of money to effect the result of the election? A.—I never did, Sir.

Q.—Or with regard to obtaining money for yourself or any member of the board? A.—I never did.

LIBERTIES OF AN AMERICAN CITIZEN.

Q.—Were any or the returns from Vernon Parish burned in your presence, or with your knowledge? A.—With due regard to the committee and to the Chairman of the committee, I will state that I am not willing to be catechised upon any of the results of the election, with the exception of Vernon Parish, until I have been discharged of the contempt charged upon me before the House and my liberties as an American freeman are allowed me; I will go on in order to place before the committee everything in relation to Vernon Parish that I know, but outside of that, in regard to the election, I must decline most respectfully until the punishment which I have been adjudged shall have been carried out or I shall have been relieved of it. Now, Sir, I am ready to answer your question.

Q.—You may state whether polls two and nine, or any other polls from Vernon Parish, were burned or otherwise destroyed in your presence or with your knowledge? A.—None, Sir, whatever; and the man who has sworn to it is an unmitigated liar. Pardon, gentlemen; I don't mean to offend the feelings of the committee, but the outrage upon my rights excites me, and, as a matter of course, it brings from me language which, perhaps, I ought not to use before this body.

Q.—Did you make any request or give any direction for the destruction, in any form, of any paper returned to the board? A.—I never did, Sir.

Q.—Or any paper relating to the elections? A.—I never did, Sir.

Q.—Did you have any knowledge of the destruction of any? A.—I did not; I will make a statement now in connection with that matter; the compiled returns by the Supervisor of Registration of the Parish of Vernon was transmitted—a single sheet—to the Returning Board by mail, a route of 400 miles; it was opened in the presence of the gentlemen who were there from the North for the purpose of witnessing the count; there was but a single paper in that return, the compiled statement from the Supervisor of Registration; there was a general protest by all of the Hayes Electors, and I think other protests, but there was no poll list or tally sheet from Vernon; there were no such documents returned, and therefore none to be burned.

Mr. Lawrence here called the attention of the witness to the Senate document containing the letter of Senator Sherman to the President, and the accompanying proceedings of the Returning Board confirming the statement that there was no tally sheet received from Vernon Parish.

In response to further questions the witness testified: I am not acquainted with Littlefield; I never saw him until the 20th of November; I did not know his name for a week after he was a Clerk for the board; I never have spoken 12 words to him in my life; I never requested or, directed him to make an alteration in the return from Vernon Parish, or any other, and never had any conversation with him about his duties as Clerk. The committee then took a recess.

LAW REPORTS.

A BATCH OF CITY SUITS.

AN ALDERMAN'S SALARY—DAMAGES FOR THE NEGLIGENCE OF THE DEPARTMENT OF BUILDINGS—AN ACTION ON CONTRACT AND ONE FOR SLIPPING ON ICE.

A number of suits against the City were before the courts yesterday. The case of Seery against the Mayor, &c., was argued before Judge Van Vorst in Supreme Court, Special Term. The plaintiff was an Alderman prior to 1870, and was legislated out of office by the charter of that year. He claims that the charter was unconstitutional, because it did not terminate the office, but merely put an end to his official life. He sues for salary. The City demurred to the complaint, and Judge Van Vorst sustained the demurrer, giving judgment for the City.

Ellen Kelly was one of the persons injured by the falling in of the roof of St. Andrew's Church, in Duane street, and has brought suit against the City to recover $10,000 damages. She claims that the Department of Buildings did not do its duty in the matter, and that the accident was owing to the negligence of the department, for which the City is responsible. The City demurred to the complaint, and the case was brought before Judge Van Vorst, in the Supreme Court, Special Term, yesterday. D. J. Dean, who appeared for the City, claimed that the City was not responsible for the negligence of the Department of Buildings, since any public officer appointed to do a public duty not specially for the advantage of the City as a corporation is not such a servant or agent of the City as to make the latter responsible for his acts of negligence. Judge Van Vorst reserved his decision.

The General Term of the Court of Common Pleas rendered a decision in the case of Tone against the Mayor, &c. The plaintiff sued on a contract for the regulating and grading of One Hundred and Twenty-third street. The City defended on the ground that it was a condition precedent in the contract that no sum was to be due thereon until the confirmation of an assessment for the work, and that there had been no such confirmation when the action was brought. At Trial Term the complaint was dismissed, and this ruling is sustained by the General Term. J. H. Strahan appeared for the plaintiff, and A. J. Requier for the City.

In Battersby against the Mayor, &c., the plaintiff sued to recover damages on account of personal injuries received by him in slipping on a piece of ice in crossing Nassau street. The complaint was dismissed on the ground that no negligence was shown on the part of the City. The General Term of the Court of Common Pleas, Chief Justice Daly delivering the opinion, has sustained this decision. William C. Reddy appeared for the plaintiff and Francis Lynde Stetson for the City.

The suits of Richmond and Davis against the Mayor, &c., which were brought before Judge Van Vorst in Supreme Court, Special Term, yesterday, were to recover the amount of assessments which were levied for the paving of Fifth avenues from One Hundred and Twenty-third to One Hundred and Thirtieth street. In one case, $5,000 were paid, and in the other, $1,500, after the property of the plaintiffs had been advertised for sale for non-payment of the assessments. The plaintiffs claim that the assessments levying the work were not advertised properly, and also that they paid the amounts of the assessments under coercion. On behalf of the City it was claimed that there is no coercion where a threat is made to sell real estate, and that the payment by the plaintiffs of their assessments was voluntary, and they cannot recover. Decision was reserved.

SALE OF STEP-CHILDREN'S PROPERTY.

C. August Schuster, in 1865, married a widow named Maria F. Bosch. The latter had three minor children at the time. Mrs. Schuster, shortly after her marriage, mortgaged her house at No. 60 Eldridge street to a Mrs. Maria H. Brush for $3,000. The former died in May, 1866, and gave by will all her property to her children, but appointing Mr. Schuster as Administrator of the property until the children became of age or married. Schuster filed no inventory of the property with the Surrogate, but lived on the premises for about 10 years, during which period he paid regularly the interest on the mortgage to Mrs. Brush, Schuster, becoming rather nettled at a proceeding which was begun for the purpose of compelling him to file the inventory with the Surrogate, instigated, as is charged, a proceeding on the part of Mrs. Brush to foreclose the mortgage on the property. He then filed an inventory which showed only $53 assets. He also made an accounting, which seemed to show that the children were indebted to him to the amount of $6,694. This accounting was objected to. The guardian who was appointed for the children wished to have the mortgage assigned so as to save expense; but this was refused, and the foreclosure suit was proceeded with to judgment. The mortgaged property was sold in November, 1867, for $4,410 to Schuster, who then executed a $4,000 mortgage to Mrs. Brush. Judge Donohue, in Supreme Court's Chambers, yesterday granted a motion for the resale of the property, it appearing that there are persons who are willing to pay $7,000 for the same, and it being shown that the foreclosure proceedings were instituted by Schuster's benefit, and that he, by his conduct, prevented the obtaining for the property as high a price as it should have brought.

THE LAW OF ARRESTS.

A novel and interesting question was argued before Judge Barrett, in Supreme Court, Chambers, yesterday, in the case of Lingsweiler against Webster, which came up on a motion to vacate an order of arrest. The defendant has been confined in Ludlow Street Jail since last February. The suit against him was for goods sold and delivered. The cause of arrest was for fraudulently contracting the debt, and it was distinct from the cause of action. The defendant's counsel omitted to move to vacate the order of arrest, and judgment by default was entered against the defendant. The case is one of those where, by section 238 of the code, an execution against the person can be issued only where an order of arrest was served before judgment; and the question of the validity of the arrest can be vacated only before judgment, and there seemed in this case no prospect of getting the defendant out of jail. It was claimed by the defendant's counsel, however, that the order of arrest was a nullity, the affidavit on which it was granted not having been sufficient to confer jurisdiction upon the Judge who granted it. Judge Barrett took the papers and reserved his decision. J. Alexander Koones appeared for the motion, and Arthur J. Delaney in opposition.

AN ORDER OF ARREST VACATED.

Judge Lawrence, in Supreme Court, Chambers, yesterday rendered a decision vacating an order of arrest against the defendant in the suit of Richard K. Scott against Hardy Solomon. The parties to the action are residents of Columbia, S. C. In June, 1875, Scott lent to Solomon $5,000 in money, and bonds worth $10,000. The latter was at this time President of the South Carolina Bank and Trust Company, and, as claimed, owned nearly all of its stock. Scott alleges that Solomon gave him a certificate of deposit on the company as security for the $5,000. This was done, according to Scott's story, for the purpose of defrauding him, Solomon intending to run the company in such a way as to render the certificate worthless. Scott says that Solomon disposed of his property and closed the doors of the company on July 2, 1875. Scott also charges Solomon with converting to his own use the proceeds of the $10,000 bonds. On such allegations Solomon was arrested in this City last Summer while returning with Scott from a trip to Saratoga. Solomon moved to have the order of arrest vacated. He claimed that the money and bonds were lent to the bank and not to him individually. Judge Lawrence vacated the order of arrest.

NEW RULES IN BANKRUPTCY.

The following rules in bankruptcy have been adopted by the United States Circuit Court:

In actions at law a consent to a reference of the whole issue must likewise contain provision that judgment shall not be entered until after 10 days' notice of the filing of the report of the Referee, and of the judgment to be entered thereon.

After a reference, at any time before the entry of judgment, either party may move for a new trial upon a case or exceptions, and if such motion be denied, the motion and the questions involved in it may be entered on the record as if it had been a ruling made upon the trial by the Judge without a jury, and excepted to in like manner.

When a motion for a new trial is intended to be made, the court may extend the time for entering judgment upon the application of the moving party, and may stay all other proceedings until the decision of the motion.

No. 131—Johnstown Cheese Company vs. Veghte; argument resumed and concluded. No. 141—Lewis vs. Redfield; argued by George F. Danforth for appellant, W. F. Cogswell for respondent; case still on.

GEN. WILLIAMSON'S WILL.

Gen. George W. Williamson, an aged gentleman, well known in New-York and the Southern States, died in this City on Jan. 7, leaving an estate valued at $150,000. Several years ago he made a will, which, upon being opened after his death, was found to bequeath to his widow an annuity of $3,000 and to devise the bulk of his estate to his son by his first wife, David B. Williamson. The instrument stipulated that if Mrs. Williamson insisted upon having her portion, as a wife, the bequest of the annuity should be nullified. Mrs. Williamson now contests the will on the grounds that the testator was unduly influenced in its making, that fraud was practiced, and that Gen. Williamson was mentally incapacitated from making a true will. The case came up for trial before Surrogate Calvin yesterday, and several witness were examined. John McKeon appears for Mrs. Williamson, and Mr. Sutherland for David B. Williamson.

Republicans at Washington are getting too much accustomed to the mental attitude of surrender. Mr. DAVID DUDLEY FIELD has been permitted to bully witnesses before the Louisiana Committee with a brutal violence worthy of JEFFRIES, without a protest from the Republican minority. These mild-mannered gentlemen even appear to have found some difficulty in plucking up courage enough to protest against the very impudent trick by which FIELD contrived to get before the Electoral Commission a garbled report of the testimony taken by the committee, and were only too ready to allow the Ring counselor an opportunity to back out from the responsibility for this proceeding. The supineness of the minority in the House has been taken advantage of by the Democratic leaders to subject two of the members of the Louisiana Returning Board to indignities against which a common felon would have been secure. If Congress possesses the power to put State officers who may differ from it on questions of jurisdiction in dark, damp, and ill-ventilated dungeons, the sooner some restrictions are placed on the exercise of such authority the better. If that power is being used without a shadow of legal or judicial authority, somebody ought to be called sharply to account for a piece of monstrous usurpation and a gross exhibition of partisan malice. There was a time when a section of the old Whig Party was chiefly remarkable for the amount of kicking it could bear from the slave-holding oligarchy. If any considerable number of Republican Congressmen are disposed to take insults meekly at the hands of the Democratic bullies of to-day, they may fairly expect some supplementary and still more vigorous kicking from their constituents.

Ex-Gov. WELLS, the Chairman of the Louisiana Returning Board, contradicts the testimony of MADDOX in every essential detail. He had no conversation whatever with MADDOX in regard to the use of money to influence the result of the election; he sent no such telegrams as those attributed to him; he never intimated that he wanted a million of dollars, or any other sum, to count the vote of the State for TILDEN; and he never met or, indeed, knew of the existence of Col. PICKETT as a coadjutor of MADDOX. Compelled to choose between the testimony of Mr. WELLS and that of the pair of self-convicted scoundrels who are his accusers, there can be but little hesitation as to which ought to be accepted. It does not require a belief in the immaculate virtue of the Chairman of the Louisiana Board or in that of his associates, to refuse to condemn them on any such evidence as that which has been trumped up for Democratic use. The meanest criminal would not be convicted on the testimony of rascals by profession like MADDOX and PICKETT, and whatever people may think of the general credibility of the members of the Louisiana Returning Board, they are entitled to the full benefit of the very explicit denials with which they have met the assertions of DAVID DUDLEY FIELD's pet witnesses.

The contradiction of LITTLEFIELD's testimony by Gov. WELLS was equally emphatic. That person had succeeded in raising quite an imposing structure of fiction based on the assertion that the original tally-sheet from Vernon Parish had, at the request of Gov. WELLS, been destroyed. The official report of the proceedings was produced to show that no such papers as those described by LITTLEFIELD had ever been in the possession of the board or of any of its members. Mr. WELLS denounced LITTLEFIELD as "an unmitigated liar," and he certainly ought to know something of the character of the ex-clerk of the board. Only, it must be admitted to be a little unfortunate that the failings of this ingenious perjurer were not discovered sooner.

Accounts from Mexico show that the Presidential election is going in favor of DIAZ. This is like saying that the Dutch have taken Holland. DIAZ ruled out all possible contestants as ineligible, and if he is not unanimously elected, it will be because some of the voters have amused themselves by choosing electors pledged to candidates who could not be elected in any event whatever. But while the election goes on prosperously for the sole candidate, a counter-revolution is organized at the capital. It is necessary that DIAZ should hurry back to the City of Mexico, in order to prevent his Government from falling to pieces. The Cabinet is riven by dissensions, and the money-lenders are ready for a change of administration. So far, the United States Government has avoided any necessity for recognizing the present usurpation, but the threatened change in the Mexican Legation at Washington will compel the State Department to decide whether LERDO's appointee, or a representative of DIAZ, is the authorized diplomatic agent of the Mexican Republic.

MIDHAT PASHA, Grand Vizier and inventor of the Constitution for the Ottoman Empire, has been dismissed, and EDHEM PASHA is appointed in his place. When MIDHAT was made Grand Vizier, EDHEM PASHA succeeded him as President of the Council of State. He now follows him into the high office of Premier. EDHEM was the Turkish Plenipotentiary to the conference, though SAFVET PASHA, as Minister for Foreign Affairs, was a more conspicuous figure during the sittings of that council. The latter official was conciliatory and evasive, as was MIDHAT, until the final decisive moment arrived. EDHEM, on the other hand, was belligerent and openly hostile to every proposal offered by the foreign powers. The present change indicates no relaxation in the lately vigorous policy of the Sublime Porte.

The Assembly Committee on Cities ought to reach at once some decision on the Salary bill and the charter amendments, introduced by Mr. FISH. The Senate has already given very convincing proofs of the sincerity of its desire to do something for the relief of New-York tax-payers, and the Assembly cannot afford to repeat the game of procrastination by which the people of this City were cheated out of reform legislation last year. Mr. FISH's committee have had ample time for deliberation over the principal City bills now before them, and they can have no excuse for misapprehending the drift of public sentiment in regard to these measures. It will be well for them to remember that the Tammany Republicans in this City have interests and alliances which run directly counter to the public demands, and that the less they complicate their deliberations by any consideration of the "claims" of the hungry crowd of tax-eaters of either party the more faithfully will they be able to discharge their obligations to the tax-payers.

The famous Castellani collection of antiques is now open for exhibition at the Metropolitan Museum of Art, and invites such leisurely inspection as was not practicable at the Centennial Exposition. It is hardly necessary to add a word to the full descriptions of this rare array made in the columns of THE TIMES. There are really two groups in the collection, one being of gems, marbles, personal ornaments, &c., from prehistoric times down to the sixteenth century. The other is of ceramics, the objects being arranged so as to form a complete historical record of the art from the time of the Arabs to the seventeenth century. It is desirable that this last-named group shall be bought for our museum; so much of the purchase money as can be raised from admission fees will be applied for that purpose.

THE ARGUMENTS BEFORE THE ELECTORAL COMMISSION.

By the operation of the rules of the Electoral Commission, the arguments before it, though not in form touching the merits of the case referred to it—that of Florida—have become exceedingly important, and the decision upon them may determine the main question, not only as to Florida, but as to the other disputed Southern States. Messrs. EVARTS and O'CONOR yesterday discussed the question of the evidence which the Commission may receive or has already received. It was held by the Democratic counsel that the Commission already had before it, by virtue of the statements made in the written objection to the Hayes certificates, various proceedings of the courts and Legislature of Florida, tending to overthrow the authority of the Republican Electors. It was further held that the Commission might receive additional evidence going to prove that the Hayes Electors were not in fact elected, but that the Tilden Electors received a majority of the votes in Florida in November. The power to take this evidence and to act on it, on the part of the Commission, was maintained to be of like nature and extent with the power of courts in respect of a writ of quo warranto, or an inquiry into the right to office. It will thus be seen that, on the threshold of the first case, there arises the very essential question of the powers of the Commission, and since these are, by express provision of law, the powers of Congress, the discussion takes a wide range, and necessarily goes back over much of the ground covered by the Congressional debates.

Mr. EVARTS presented the objections to the Democratic view of the powers of the Commission with his customary acuteness and dispassionate calmness. Probably no lawyer of our day possesses a more penetrating intellect, or is capable of presenting more perfectly the bearing of the principles of constitutional law upon a question of the intricacy and scope of that argued by him yesterday. Certainly, none would treat the matter with greater breadth. The report of the Associated Press, though doubtless made with the desire to be literally accurate, is extremely confused, and we regret that our readers will be in part deprived of the pleasure of seeing Mr. EVARTS' argument in its best form, and exactly as it was made. Mr. EVARTS dismissed with brief exposure of its absurdity the Democratic claim that everything mentioned in the objections to the votes was already before the Commission. To admit that would be simply to turn the settlement of the powers of the Commission over to the Senators and Representatives who chose to put in objections. If the Commission were to go behind the certificates and the papers sent with them from the meeting of the two houses, it must do so on the formal adjudication of its own powers. The suggestion that it could be compelled to do so by the action of "volunteer objectors" in Congress was of the nature of a trick, and one to which the Commission will hardly give serious attention.

Obviously, if the Commission is to go behind the certificate, it must be to dispute its correctness, and if it does this, it cannot stop short of the ballot-box, and must investigate every intermediate step. It must ascertain if the State canvassers acted lawfully on the county returns, and if the county officials performed their duty with reference to the district returns; if the district officers were proper in their dealings with the votes, and if the voters were themselves qualified. Such an investigation is entirely pertinent in a quo warranto proceeding, and would be so for the Commission had the latter the character of a court entertaining an application for such a writ. But Mr. EVARTS pointed out that Congress has not given the writ of quo warranto in the case of President. It might do so, but as a matter of fact it has not. No tribunal exists with the power to take such proceedings. Least of all is the Commission such a tribunal. Congress has no power under the Constitution to give it any such powers. Congress could give them only to courts inferior to the Supreme Court, constituted of Judges nominated by the President and confirmed by the Senate. To no other tribunal could Congress give judicial powers such as the Democrats claim for the Commission.

There are other reasons why Congress could not authorize the Commission to do more than decide which are the proper certificates from Florida. It did not itself possess any further authority than this. After the certificates were opened the votes were then to be counted, and Congress was supposed still to be continuing the session of last Thursday. The process must be summary and decisive. To interpose a trial by a court with judicial and plenary powers and duties, authorized and required to settle all questions that may arise, by the ordinary processes of collecting, comparing, sifting, and weighing evidence, would be simply to prevent any election whatever. The votes must of necessity be counted by the 4th of March. If they were not, the President of the Senate would become Acting President, and there must be a new election. There was nowhere any authority given to Congress to set up a special tribunal with the power to produce such a result.

The reply of Mr. O'CONOR to these arguments was, especially in its opening and in its close, marked by a good deal of partisan heat, from which all the remarks on the Republican side have thus far been entirely free. The essential part of the argument was that there need not result any inconvenience from the scope sought to be given to the Commission's powers, because the Commission could use them so as to prevent it. This, of course, does not touch the substance of the objection, which is that Congress has no right to place it within the discretion of a Commission to produce such results. Moreover, it fails conspicuously to reach the constitutional limitations on the power of Congress itself.

We have pointed out that these preliminary arguments touch the broad question of the powers of the Commission; but they do not exhaust it, by any means. It will be again taken up on the discussion of the merits of the Florida case. Meanwhile, the Republicans are not seeking to confine the Commission within the strict limits imposed on it by the Constitution from any fear of the truth. If the Commission decide to open up evidence as to the election, the Republican counsel promise to show that the actual legal vote, some of which the canvassers could not reach, was heavily for HAYES.

PACIFIC RAILROAD INDEBTEDNESS.

An evening contemporary, reporting Wall street matters yesterday, says that "Union Pacific stock has been steadily advancing of late, until 68 was made to-day. Good parties, not in close relations with the Dillon-Gould management, but believers in the road, are talking well of the stock." The holders of this stock, with "the Dillon-Gould management" at their head, are heavily indebted to the Government, and are doing their utmost to prevent an arrangement by which it may be protected against loss. Within the precincts of the National Capitol they plead poverty as an excuse for the non-payment of their debts. The road, they declare, is not able to bear the burden of a sinking fund equivalent to the extinction of the indebtedness to the Government, whose munificent liberality is the source of whatever strength the company possesses. In Wall street the same people adopt a very different tone. They expatiate on the resources and future of the road. They "bull" the stock in spite of the possibilities of adverse legislation, and in spite, too, of the debt which, if not soon provided for, will ultimately crush the stock out of existence. They point to the payment of dividends as evidence of prosperity, and in one way or another contrive to give an upward movement to a stock which, judged by the company's representations at Washington, can have no intrinsic value. That these representations are false, and that the company is able to comply with the requirements either of the House bill, passed last Summer, or of Mr. THURMAN's bill, reported from the Senate Judiciary Committee, a fact set forth in the last report of the company clearly proves. More than fifty per cent. of the gross receipts on the last year's business were profit, the total having been $12,113,990, while the expense of operating the road was $5,447,819. It is preposterous to pretend that a company whose net earnings were $6,666,171, cannot annually pay the $750,000 in addition to the 5 per cent. and the money earned from the United States, as provided for in the House bill, of the million and a half, in addition to half the earnings for Government transportation, as contemplated by the Judiciary Committee. A management which finds money to divide as dividends for the purpose of imparting a fictitious value to the stock, and which will not forego immediate gain in order that an ever-increasing indebtedness may be secured, is not an honest management, or one that is entitled to consideration at the hands of Congress.

The Central Pacific, which, besides being a huge debtor to the Government, is always ready to bring its influence to bear in favor of corrupt legislation on railroad questions, has even less excuse than the Union Pacific for leaving its indebtedness unadjusted. Its sixty-two millions of capital stock is divided among a "ring" of ninety-five individuals, and not a share is ever heard of in the open market. It is a close corporation—an arrogant and practically irresponsible monopoly—and only the initiated know its actual gains. What we do know is that of the $14,610,400 gross earnings of the last business year, no less than $7,720,454 were net earnings. As the company's entire bonded indebtedness—exclusive of the $27,855,680, with accumulating interest, on account of the Government bonds—is only $33,604,508, a margin remains on the net income amply sufficient to yield the annual contribution called for by either of the measures we have referred to. The House bill fixes the amount at $568,210 beyond the sum earned for Government transportation, and the 5 per cent. stipulated for in the original act—an amount unreasonably small compared with that to be exacted from the Union Pacific, bearing in mind the relative financial strength of the two enterprises. Mr. THURMAN's bill proposes the same terms for both, coupled with a proviso which would disarm any opposition not intent upon evading the payment of just debts. It is that the specified contribution, together with the half of the Government earnings and the 5 per cent. on the net earnings, shall not exceed one-fourth of the total net income of the company. Looking at the figures we have cited, it is apparent that enough would still be left to provide for all the legitimate requirements of the road, and to yield some dividend on the stock. The latter circumstance is not one that should have great weight. The first duty of a corporation is to provide for its debts, and a company like the Central Pacific, whose stock is so valuable, and is held so tightly that not a share has been publicly sold since the opening of the road, forfeits all right to the forbearance of Congress when it resists at every stage propositions which, at the best, will in the end only avert from the national Treasury serious loss.

The outcry raised in behalf of these companies might convey to those who have not watched the progress of the controversy the idea that some scandalous wrong was about to be inflicted upon struggling and meritorious corporations. The outcry could hardly be louder if the companies were called upon at once to pay arrearages of interest due the Government, and at the same time to form a fund for the redemption of the Government bonds at maturity. The two companies are, however, on their own showing, prosperous. They have the command of so much money that they can afford to divide large sums among the stockholders. They are, therefore, debarred by their own acts from pleading poverty. Nor can they with any better grace fall back upon the decision of the Supreme Court, based upon an interpretation of an agreement which by its own terms reserves to the Government the right of so amending the provisions as to protect the public interest. The House has decided that this right shall now be exercised, and the Judiciary Committee of the Senate have placed the right itself upon a solid foundation of equity. The expediency of the case scarcely needs elucidation. Why should the Government go on, year after year, paying out the tax-payers' money for the accommodation of dividend-earning railroads? Why should there be delay in effecting a settlement which will be more difficult the longer it is deferred, and which, if postponed until the bonds reach maturity, would be impossible save on one of two conditions—the assumption by the Government of the roads, or the sacrifice by the Government of a part of the debt to secure the remainder? Nothing less than legislative coercion will bring the companies to reason. Their proposal, as embodied in the bill reported by Mr. WEST from the Railroad Committee, is so absurdly inadequate that it ought not to be entertained. Its main feature is the sale to the Government of millions of acres of the land which the Government, in the first instance, gave to the companies. The choice of the Senate, then, really lies between the House bill and Mr. THURMAN's bill, and we hope that one or the other will become law this session.

The country will suffer heavy loss from the obligations incurred in behalf of the Pacific railroads whatever action Congress may take on the general question. The Kansas Pacific, after a long struggle with its embarrassments, recently passed into the charge of Receivers, and will almost certainly share the fate of bankrupt enterprises. Its bonded indebtedness to the Government is $6,303,000, with about two millions more on account of interest past due. As the security held by the Government is only that of a second mortgage, while the first mortgage bonds, now in default, amount to upward of twelve millions, it is morally certain that the impending foreclosure will result in a total loss of the advances made by the Government, and of all the principal and interest hereafter to be paid on its bonds. On general grounds, the impolicy of the aid rendered by the Government to roads of the class of the Kansas Pacific, the Sioux City and Pacific, and the Central Branch Union Pacific, is now manifest. For great trunk roads across the Continent, strong arguments have in times past been available. The minor roads we have enumerated never had any title to national assistance, and the people will pay dearly for the recklessness which afforded it. Not one of the three will ever discharge a dollar of its indebtedness to the Government.

A FOOLISH EXPERIMENT.

There is some talk of organizing a carnival in New-York. The bare statement of this fact is ludicrous enough. It is an attempt to introduce a custom of Southern Europe under the unpropitious conditions of our Northern climate. The experiment has been tried in New-Orleans, Memphis, and a few other South-western cities, but with indifferent success. Whether as mardi gras or carnival, the public celebration of the reign of folly has never been received with kindly appreciation in this country. Our people are too utilitarian, too intensely practical, to enter into the spirit of the saturnalia which the institution originally was. Even in Rome and Venice, where the carnival was born, the people annually complain that the celebration is losing its brilliancy and abandon. In the good old time, when absolutism relieved the people of all political care, and gave them gilded trifles to amuse themselves withal, the mad frolic of the carnival suited the humor of the populace. It furnished them an excitement which acted as a safety-valve, and prevented them from thinking too much of serious things. It was a carnest of fun and folly. Whether the world has grown wiser or not, it has certainly grown too serious for the carnival.

But a street carnival in New-York! What could be more utterly absurd? Imagine the melancholy of a fantastic pageant under our cold skies, with a flurry of snow in the air, and the pavements half-covered with the unutterable filth and paleocrystic layers which the Street-cleaning Bureau permits us to endure. It would be like Christmas beef in the tropics, or a midsummer picnic in the open Polar Sea. To be sure, we have "carnivals" of all sorts, according to the penny-a-liners. There are carnivals of crime, billiard carnivals, and even carnivals of the fire-fiend, in the dialect of the industrious gentlemen whose business it is to garnish with big phrases the commonest events of everyday life. In this free and easy community there is no such thing as a farewell to meat; therefore there is no carni vale, and the very meaning of the word has no value or is forgotten. But to make a real carnival, that is, as real as one could be in this latitude, would require more courage and audacity than we give our people credit for. When Smith, Hobson, or Dobson, honest artisans or tradesmen, array themselves as mediæval cavaliers or punchinellos, they slink into the masked ball under a cover of some kind, and are melancholy until they find themselves in company with a multitude of similarly disguised merry-makers. If one of these hilarious harlequins strays into the street, he is a target for the violent wit of the street lounger and the lawful prey of the policeman. The masker does not bloom well in the bleak streets of New-York, however he may flourish in New-Orleans and Memphis.

The Roman Corso, crowded with gorgeously-dressed figures, lined with lofty and decorated buildings, and alive with the unbridled gayety of an Italian populace, is not to be transplanted to New-York. It is complained that the masked balls give ten unsympathizing spectators in the boxes to one masker on the floor. A procession of carnival merry-makers on Broadway would be regarded with cynical disdain, to say the least, by that relentless majority which is usually known as the Sidewalk Committee. Nevertheless, the show would be eagerly entered into by our enterprising tradesmen. The lager-bier wagons, blazoned with advertisements, would appear in full force. Rival corn-doctors would air their liveries and their surgical achievements, and the unending war of the piano-makers would break out with redoubled fury. Independence Day and the 22d of February are not secure from the free advertising of our thrifty citizens. Let those who propose to try the hazardous experiment of setting up a carnival pageant in Broadway, think twice before they invite a mountebank trade show.

It is a common saying that we do not have holidays enough, nor fun enough, in this country. It is to our discredit, possibly, that we take our few pleasures sadly. But this is true of the race. The Anglo-Saxon is not much given to merry-making. The American, or Briton, in Rome or in India looks on the fun with a certain sense of amusement. But it is the amusement which he has in watching a cage of sportive monkeys. Secretly, he despises the merry-makers, and thinks that a despotic Government and a public opinion without newspapers are good enough for them. The reproach that we are dull and unsympathetic in respect of pleasuring will never be taken away until the race is made over. And even careless and sunny Italy is no longer so careless and sunny as it was. Politics, rents, taxes, and popular rights unfit any people for carnival-keeping and an absolute abandonment to folly. Since we have carried street-cars and constitutional freedom into Turkey, it would be mere foolishness to try to engraft a pagan Roman festival upon the rude stock of American civilization. Some of our fellow-citizens from the Old World have tried the experiment of reviving here their picturesque customs and open-air pageants, before now. The result has been most unsatisfactory. Gradually these homesick enthusiasts have given over their feeble attempts. There is something in the atmosphere which chills them, and they admit that they are "Americanized." Perhaps, this is a pity. Nevertheless, it is true. Therefore a New-York carnival would be a ghastly mockery.

STILL ANOTHER SHOWER.

After the showers of snakes, frogs, hash, and other remarkable objects which have recently occurred in this favored land, we ought not to be astonished at anything of the sort, except, perhaps, a shower of extra-sized elephants, with their tails tied up with blue ribbon. Nevertheless, a shower occurred the other day in Oshkosh, or some other Western city to the same effect, which nearly created a terrible and fatal panic, and indeed did result in serious injury to at least one estimable citizen.

It took place in a meeting-house on Sunday morning, and its area was restricted to the region immediately under the organ-loft. It is a noticeable fact that the area of abnormal showers always is extremely small. The recent snake shower in Memphis, for example, was confined to two vacant lots. There is, then, nothing in the limited extent of the Oshkosh shower which need create any doubts as to its actual occurrence. Of course, its area might have been coincident with the entire length of the galleries, but it is not our place to sit in judgment upon the operations of nature and dictate the precise area of this or that variety of shower.

Now that the shower is over, it is very easy for the critical Oshkoshian to claim that young ladies ought not to be allowed to occupy the organ gallery. It will not do, however, to thoughtlessly admit this claim. Its advocates could with equal justice insist that new bonnets ought not to be admitted to the body of a meeting-house, and that Deacons should be compelled to wear fire-helmets while on duty. It is true that were those precautions to be taken, the recurrence of the shower would become either impossible or at all events harmless; but radical changes like these should not be lightly made in any church. The proposal to spread a large net immediately under the front of the organ gallery is also objectionable, since it would rapidly become a receptacle for hymn-books and sandwiches, and would only partially arrest the danger of a sudden shower of the kind in question. These proposals are akin to those of preventing panics in theatres by chloroforming the spectators, and of rendering the latter safe against fire by soaking them in tungstate of soda. In each case the desired end might be partially secured, but only at a sacrifice of comfort too great to be thought of.

The shower descended just as the minister had reached the most eloquent part of his sermon. It is all very well to say that the audience ought to have kept their eyes fixed on their Pastor, and their ears deaf to all sounds save that of his eloquent voice. There are circumstances in which the strongest men lose, momentarily, their self-control, even when in church. When preliminary shrieks, followed by a heavy crash, and the cry of some strong Deacon in his agony, drown the minister's voice, only the soundest sleeper can avoid being startled. In this particular instance the minister himself abruptly paused in his discourse and turned deadly pale, and we cannot wonder that his hearers sprang to their feet and began to rush wildly to the door. Those who witnessed the shower were under the impression that it was a rain of purple and fine linen mingled with barber's poles. A meteorological phenomenon of this kind would naturally have a blood-curdling effect, and the wonder is not that a panic occurred, but that it was checked by the timely efforts of two or three calm and determined men before any one had been trampled to death or seriously wounded.

It would be a hopeless task to attempt to eradicate an interest in bonnets from the female soul. Theoretically, a church soprano ought to give her whole attention to her vocal duties, except when courteously listening to the humble efforts of the Pastor to fill up in an attractive way the intervals between the hymns. But we must not lay upon any church singer burdens heavier than her sex can bear. If during the sermon a new bonnet of remarkable architectural merit enters the church, the soprano will inevitably look at it. We might as well attempt to abolish the law of gravitation as to abolish this feminine instinct. Either remedy would, of course, have prevented the Oshkosh shower, could it have been employed, but it is idle to talk of repealing the fundamental laws of nature.

The Deacon was severely, but not fatally, hurt. He was struck directly upon the back of the neck, where two indentations, of the general size and shape of small boot-heels, are still visible to attest the violence of the shower. It is unnecessary to repeat the exact words which he is said to have used at the moment when he first felt the blow. Very possibly he never said anything of the kind; but if he did, it should be remembered that, under the influence of sudden surprise or sharp agony, a good man may sometimes express himself in a brusque manner. Moreover, it has yet to be established that "Jerusalem" is a profane expression. The Deacon may have intended to repeat the first lines of the hymn—"Jerusalem, my happy home." If so, his intention was unquestionably devout rather than profane.

It may be safely assumed that she will never lean over to look at another bonnet, at least in that particular church. She was not seriously injured, for the Deacon was soft and elastic, at least for his years; but she resigned her position as the church soprano early in the following week. There was a general feeling among the church members that she was not conducive to the solemnity which ought to characterize the services, and that the Deacons must be protected at any cost. Especial stress was laid by the elder ladies of the congregation upon the essentially worldly nature of alternate red and white stripes. The upshot of the matter was that the soprano withdrew permanently from the organ gallery, and the Deacon, after having been carefully repaired, was provided with a pew in the exact centre of the church.

Of course, this shower was not predicted by the Weather Bureau. No shower of any real merit ever is. Very likely it will be repeated in some other church at some future time, but it will fall upon the just Deacon or the unjust small boy without being previously announced by "Probabilities." The story of the Oshkosh shower ought, however, to be widely published, for the sake of its moral, though, so far, it does not appear altogether clear precisely what its moral really is.

THE CASTELLANI COLLECTION.

METROPOLITAN MUSEUM OF ART.

First Notice.

Yesterday afternoon, by special invitation extended to the members of the press by Signor Castellani and the Trustees of the Metropolitan Museum of Art, the Castellani collection, consisting of statues and busts, with bronzes, ivories, jewelry, and engraved gems of Italo-Grecian, Etruscan, Greek, and Roman periods, with the majolica, was open for inspection. This collection, which was the great centre of attraction in Memorial Hall at the Centennial, gains immensely in its new quarters. In Philadelphia, notwithstanding the most judicious disposition, the space given to the collection was restricted. Though roominess is not exactly necessary for the exhibition of jewelry, when statues are to be appreciated, low ceilings and adjacent walls destroy all effects. The old gallery in the Museum, having had all the pictures removed, has been especially redecorated and arranged for the Castellani collection, and this spacious room, with its softened lights, forms an admirable receptacle for the newly-acquired treasures. To the right and left on entering are ranged the statues and busts, some 23 in number; here, in numerous glass cases, are the antique gems, the Assyrian cylinders, the Phœnician, Etruscan, and Greek wonders of the glyptic art, and the cistæ, the bronzes, with the delicately engraved Etruscan mirrors. In several long cases, placed at a convenient height from the floor, are exhibited in trays all the miracles of the ancient jewelers' art, where, in perfect sequence, commencing with the bronze and amber ornaments of prehistoric times, the whole history of personal ornamentation can be followed down to the period of the Crusades. In chronological order there is also shown a collection of rings, some 352 in number. Against the wall at the back of the room and on the sides are placed the masterpieces of Italian ceramic art. This collection, beginning with the earliest productions made by the Arabs in Sicily, where, to a faint metallic lustre were united peculiar Arabesque designs, illustrates the very beginning of Italian art, until it expanded almost miraculously into the fine creations of Luca della Robia. Now, all in a blaze of glory, glistening with iridescence of color, fairly on fire, as if the plates, cups, and salvers were burning, this collection exhibits the wonderful productions of Maestro Giorgio Andreoli. In the quantity of this highly-prized Gubbio ware the Castellani collection is lavishly rich, there being no less than 130 pieces. Here are whole compartments of this lustrous work, with all their coruscating flashes of colors. Here are the blues and reds and emeralds, even those rare green fires which escape description. But it is not these metallic lustres, used for decorative purposes alone which render majolica so highly prized. These objects evince in their treatment a strength and vigor of drawing, a certainty of outline, that power produced by the proper adjustment of colors, and with all these advantages, the daintiest conceits employed in ornamentation. Of the later school of Italian fictile work, some very few examples, almost to be counted on one's fingers, are to be found in the United States, but of the most brilliant specimens belonging to the best period we do not know of any at all. This Castellani collection of majolica is then, as a revelation to us in this country, illustrative of a period of art most of us were never acquainted with. There may be found in this collection those specimens of Medicean porcelain which must oblige us to alter our text-book and antedate porcelain some 100 years or more. Botcher will have to be dethroned. Some years ago Dr. Foresi found certain Florentine manuscripts, indicating that Duke Francis I. had made porcelain in 1585. Here was at least documentary evidence. Now, as two pieces of this Medicean porcelain—a "lavabo" and a plate—belong to this collection, there can be no doubt about it. The claims of France, England, and Germany must be put aside, for it is to Italy that the merit of first making porcelain in Europe is due.

Having, in a rapid way, described the general character of the collection; it may be well to call attention to some of the most remarkable of the many objects. This is by no means an easy task, as there is scarcely a single group of subjects which would not furnish ample material for an elaborate article.

In the United States anything like a perfect collection of antique marbles has in reality never been grouped together. That general accent of admiration which follows statues or busts undoubtedly antique is of rather an indiscriminate character. Mostly it is enthusiasm wasted. Proper discrimination between what is archæologically of priceless worth, and what is æsthetically beautiful is hardly observed. And old torso—a head—is exhumed from Greek or Roman soil; is 2,000 years old, if you please. It may be simply curious, but not necessarily beautiful. Why are we to suppose that the genius of Praxiteles was transmitted to every ancient sculptor? There were undoubtedly in those times, as there are to-day, and must be always, fine artists and inferior ones. Propitious accidents do not always spare the best works of old art for our inspection to-day. We dig up the good, the mediocre, and the bad indifferently, and though we rightly prize them, we are, too often, prone to suppose that genius was communistic in all the periods which have gone before us. Those wonderful statues in the Cesnola collection fully illustrate what we mean. Immensely valuable, priceless, as illustrating how art commences, they explain ethnological facts, permitting us to read as in a book of race distinctions. But handsome they are not. Any emotional sensation save of awe, something quite distinctive from the appreciation of the beautiful, is rarely awakened by these Cesnola statues. Only with marbles of the best periods of Greece or Rome there is produced the double effect of both the æsthetic and archæological impulse. First, as would be natural, comes that feeling of intense delight which a form of true beauty ever conveys, and then, later, we measure the infinite period of time which has elapsed since the masterpiece left the workshop of the Greek or Roman sculptor. To be doctrinaire on the subject of antique sculpture is to be both wearisome and inconprehensible. Still, there is a word of good advice to be given to those who wish to study antique work. We are too prone to care for what is refined, and to seek for it and it only in the antique. Dandy Apollos and coquettish Dianas have had their time. To-day, with a better and more natural return of taste, the appreciation of what is realistic in ancient art delights us. It is, then, most pleasant to find so many objects of study in the Castellani collection. There is the Spinario. It is a subject well known, and has been copied for us thousands of times. Here, as exhibited, it is realism itself, but conceived in its very best mood. There is no search for what is crudest or ugliest in nature. The Spinario is simply a boy of 10 or 12, supple in every joint, who, seated on a rock, twists in a second of time one leg over the other and plucks the thorn from his foot. If there has been an impression of pain for a moment before, (you can see that in the slightly knitted brow,) the sensation has passed away, for as quick as can be, now that he has told his message to the Roman Senate, out will come the thorn. The skill of the artist is shown in the pose, in the grace of the arms, and in the ease of the curves. Peer into the face. Why look for sentimentality there? By a little device of Signor Castellani, a mirror concealed in the bottom of the case throws a faint ray of light on the head. Those are sturdy lineaments. Should a wolf come and try to filch a lamb from this shepherd, that boy would not turn and run, but would face the brute. The gods and goddesses of antiquity may be things to look at with reverence, for who can deny the powerful impressions they convey, but it is delightful to be put in juxtaposition with the men and women of Greece and Rome—to shake hands with them, to nod to them, and to almost expect a returning salutation. There is a curious, deep-implanted instinct, a craving of fellowship in the human race, which Hawthorne indicated, which wants to be especially satisfied as to the appearance of the people who have gone before us. Here is a portrait of a Roman Empress. It must have been a truthful one. Her's are no finicking graces. There is a breadth of treatment and that indescribable semi-reality about it which stamps it as a work of antiquity. You gaze at it, and find out that it is an old acquaintance. You wonder where you saw her. You cudgel your brain. Such a head attached to a portly figure you talked to not six months ago. She was a woman with no nonsense about her. A strict disciplinarian, she made her children mind her, and did her duty, strictly, impartially, lovingly. Here is, too, the head of a Roman gentleman. He may be just 30, though his hair is thin on the top of his head. If Momsen had transmitted to us the name of some rich banker's son, this would have been his living portrait. He is a cool and elegant man, and absolutely à la mode. If he studies the creases in his toga, he discards the petit maître folds of the modern Greek style, and such few rings or bulls as he may wear are of the simplest style. He may like gladiatorial fights, though he applauds but rarely, and then in a listless way. Roman! We must meet this man a fortnight ago in some drawing-room, and we chatted on art and politics with him, and though we thought he was just a trifle bored, he was eminently well informed and conservative. Would you have the purely sentimental, but conceived in in the true idealism of art, with nothing Frenchy about it? Look at that group of Pachye of the school of Praxiteles. Heavens! how we have retrograded since then. What a dainty darling Pachye is, and how gently loving she looks! And Cupid, "with his love-lock tressed!" What quiet sentiment these two small heads are steeped in! Alas! Their bodies never have been found. Centuries ago their rounded limbs were ground into dust or absorbed in the soil, or may be Alaric shivered them, and the barbarians built the fragments into a horse-stable, but all that is best of them, the spirit, the soul of the artist who created them, remains.

In the heroic, grand style, the Castellani collection contains a colossal Indian Bacchus. Apart from its amazing state of preservation, it is of surpassing beauty. Its wonderful condition is attributable to the fact that the statue was found by Signor Castellani two years ago at Postilppo, with its face downward in a bed of dry volcanic débris. Save that the knot of hair on the top of the head and an outstretched right arm are gone, the very surface of the marble as the artist left it is visible. This Bacchus has the double forehead, that upper dome of brain, which the Greek artist conventionally gave his deities. By some wonderful power of art this exaggeration to eyes unaccustomed to such cranial developments is not a bit distasteful. If this statue be a copy of the Liber Pater Pliny describes, what would have been the august subject from the hands of a Praxiteles? The Bacchus is a wonderfully impressive work of antique art, as with serene and placid gaze, unruffled and unmoved, he mysteriously looks down on a world of clay, of which he is not and with which he has no sympathy. There was only one man of our times who might have described this Bacchus, and that was Heine, when he placed him on earth to-day as one of the gods in exile.

RAPID TRANSIT PLANS.

There were certain statements published in connection with the meeting at the Mayor's office on the 31st ult. of the committee of Sixth avenue property-owners in relation to rapid transit that I beg a limited space in the TIMES to correct. It has been stated that the property-owners did not appear before the Rapid Transit Commissioners to protest against their action. If the property-owners had supposed for a moment that the Rapid Transit Commission was merely intended from the beginning as an extra official indorsement of the elevated railway schemes, which had until then been looked upon by all intelligent people as crude absurdities that would never attract the serious attention of capitalists, they would have contested with the utmost of their power the very appointment of such a board. But the proceedings of this board were actually sprung upon the public in a period of time too brief even for remonstrance, much less for deliberation. It has been said that the property-owners are merely an echo to the opposition of the Sixth Avenue Railroad. On the contrary, that company took no action whatever until long after the property-owners having become alarmed at the jeopardy in which their rights and property had been placed, organized for the protection of their interests; and they have only co-operated with the Sixth Avenue Company in so far as the rights of each were endangered. It was further stated that but a small amount of property on Sixth avenue was represented. One member of the committee represented his own interest of more than $400,000, while the aggregate amount was many millions. Mr. R. A. Wilthaus, who is mentioned as the property owner who offered to give $10

WASHINGTON.

AMERICAN CITIZENS OUTRAGED.

THE MANNER IN WHICH MEMBERS OF THE LOUISIANA RETURNING BOARD ARE TREATED.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 6.—The manner in which Messrs. Wells and Anderson, of the Louisiana Returning Board, are treated by the Sergeant at Arms of the House is an outrage upon individual rights and common decency which would not be tolerated by the lowest Police Court in America toward the meanest vagrant charged with crime. The officers of the House having these two men in custody seem to make it a study to put every possible indignity upon them, and there are good grounds for stating that this is done by direction of leading Democrats like Field and Hewitt, who are conducting the prosecution of Wells and his associates. Kenner and Casanave, the colored members of the board, are provided with comparatively comfortable quarters, being confined in the room of the Committee on Territories. Wells and Anderson are in a dungeon in the crypt, shut out from all sunlight, with closely barred windows, through which no pure air ever penetrates. The walls are damp and slimy, and the air is foul and nauseating by reason of gas escaping from broken pipes. This inhuman treatment is aggravated by the fact that Mr. Wells is a man of over 70 years of age. No one is allowed to communicate with the prisoners, and they are guarded as strictly as though they were felons awaiting capital punishment. On Saturday last Mr. Wilson, a member of the House, from Iowa, hearing of this cruel treatment, concluded to visit Wells and Anderson to ascertain if the story of their imprisonment was true. Upon reaching the dungeon he was denied admission by the jailer. He then visited the office of the Sergeant at Arms, and, in company with the chief Deputy, again repaired to the dungeon in which the prisoners are incarcerated. The jailer refused him permission to see them, after which Mr. Wilson waited upon Speaker Randall, informed him of the outrage being permitted under his authority, and demanded that permission be granted for him to visit Mr. Wells. Speaker Randall professed to be surprised at the intelligence conveyed to him and gave a peremptory order for Mr. Wilson to be admitted to see the prisoners, and promised to have them removed to more comfortable quarters. This promise however, up to to-night, has not been fulfilled. Until yesterday Mr. Wells had not been permitted to leave his cell, except to go to the committe-room in obedience to the summons of Mr. Field. Yesterday, in consequence of the protest of one of Mr. Wells' friends, Sergeant at Arms Thompson issued an order to permit him to walk around the Capitol grounds in company with his jailer, this being the only opportunity offered him for enjoying fresh air and exercise since his confinement.

Mr. Wells and Anderson are guarded so closely that all letters addressed to them are withheld, and even while in the committee-room no one is permitted to speak to them on any subject, excepting in the presence and hearing of a Deputy Sergeant at Arms. The Republicans have just learned of this outrageous brutality on the part of the officers of Congress, and it is probable it will be brought to the attention of the House and the country to-morrow. It is quite certain that Sergeant at Arms Thompson would not treat the persons in the manner described unless by instruction from prominent leaders on the Democratic side. The counsel for Wells and Anderson talk to-night about applying to the courts for a writ of habeas corpus.

A WITNESS FIELD WILL NOT CALL.

THE PROPOSITION TO CALL EX-GOV. M'CORMICK DROPPED—APPREHENSION THAT TILDEN'S BANK ACCOUNTS MAY BE EXAMINED.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 5.—It has recently been discovered that Mr. David Dudley Field, who seems determined to be nothing it not notorious, sent secretly to New-York, and, through the Cashier of the Second National Bank, secured a transcript of the bank account kept there by Messrs. Chandler and McCormick, the President and Secretary of the National Republican Committee. Mr. McCormick heard of this little transaction a day or two since, and asked Mr. Field if he desired to examine him about the accounts. "Did you send any money to the South since the 7th of November?" asked Mr. Field in reply. "No," said McCormick, "neither since nor before." "Well, then, I don't think we will examine you," said Field, and so the conversation ended. It is now believed that the reason why Mr. Field does not go into an investigation of the accounts is that he fears a cross-examination of the financial transactions of Messrs. Hewitt and Barnum, the Chairman and Treasurer of the National Democratic Committee, would be gone into by Senator Morton. There is a great deal of dissatisfaction among Republicans because such an investigation of Mr. Tilden's agents has not yet been made, and it is possible that Mr. Morton's committee may be compelled to take up the subject this week.

O'CONOR'S ABUSE OF THE PRESIDENT.

RUMORS OF AN APOLOGY FROM THE FORMER FOR HIS FOUL-MOUTHED LETTER.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 5.—There has been considerable comment to-day concerning the report of an apology by Charles O'Conor for the language he used some time ago in a published letter regarding President Grant. The details of the arrangement of the visit to the President are not fully disclosed, but it is regarded as remarkable that the President should have received into his presence, at this time, a man who had used such intemperate and brutal words in characterizing him, unless a written apology and retraction had first been unconditionally offered. It is stated in explanation that the President never saw O'Conor's letter and was not aware of the grossness of it, and he is reported to have received O'Conor as if the latter had been guilty, in a passion, of some hard words only, instead of writing deliberately of the President in the foulest and most offensive terms.

A SOLDIER DISGRACED.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 5.—Gen. John M. Corse, of Chicago, Ill., was before the Senate Committee on Privileges and Elections this morning. In reply to Senator Mitchell, he testified that Col. W. T. Pelton, of New-York, telegraphed him, about the 18th of November last, asking him to go to Oregon and look after an ineligible Elector. Witness replied to Pelton, saying that he would go, but it would take a few days for him to get to Oregon, and witness thought it better that some one should go from San Francisco. The witness admitted sending the following dispatches:

CHICAGO, Nov. 13, 1876.

To W. T. Pelton, Everett House, New-York:

The general impression is that Republicans will not allow Tilden to be counted in. We are prepared to resist any fraud. J. M. CORSE.

To Perry H. Smith, St. Charles Hotel, New-Orleans:

If Louisiana's Electoral vote is stolen from us, we will get California and Oregon. We have 100,000 ex-soldiers now enrolled. Vast numbers of Republicans with us. Stand firm. CORSE.

CHICAGO—No date.

Hon. J. M. Palmer, New-Orleans:

Two hundred thousand ex-Union soldiers are bracing thousands who voted for Hayes, sustain you. If Tilden is fraudulently counted out in Louisiana, the end is not yet. You have Illinois behind you. CORSE.
CAMERON.

Witness received the following:

To Gen. J. M. Corse, Chicago, Ill.:

If you think it necessary, you can pay National Democrat two hundred and draw on me at sight, and thus close. W. T. PELTON.

This referred to the paying of a bill for printing. The National Democrat is a German newspaper, published at Chicago. The following dispatches were also offered in evidence by Senator Mitchell:

Nov. 8, 1876.

To W. T. Pelton, Everett House, New-York:

Gen. Corse left for Wisconsin as you requested. He desired me to say that we have entertained an apprehension that an effort would be made to defeat Gov. Tilden in case of a close election, and that we are fully prepared for such emergency. Over a hundred thousand ex-soldiers are enrolled in the North in his behalf, and from present indications with that number we can call to our aid a half million, North and South, provided the opposition undertaketo deprive him of his seat as chief magistrate. DANIEL CAMERON.

SAN FRANCISCO, Nov. 17.

To Hon. A. S. Hewitt, New-York:

NEW-YORK, Nov. 17, 1876.

To Hon. James A. Kelly, San Francisco, Cal.:

Circumstances require your immediate return to Oregon to consult Governor. A. S. HEWITT.

No more testimony will be taken in connection with the Oregon case unless Senator Kernan shall desire to recall some of the witnesses who have previously testified. The full Committee on Privileges and Elections were in secret session this morning, and the Oregon case was the subject under discussion.

CONDITION OF MR. STEPHENS.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 5.—Mr. Alexander Stephens improved somewhat during the morning, and this afternoon he feels a little stronger.

A STEAM-SHIP WRECKED.

THE GEORGE WASHINGTON, OF THE CROMWELL LINE, TOTALLY WRECKED OFF CAPE RACE—THE CREW AND PASSENGERS, NUMBERING TWENTY-FIVE, DROWNED—NAMES OF THE VICTIMS.

HALIFAX, Feb. 5.—The steamer George Washington, of the Cromwell Line, hence Jan. 18, for St. John's, N. F., went ashore at Cape Race and has become a total wreck. All hands were drowned. Fourteen bodies have been washed ashore. It is supposed she went ashore during the snow-storm on Jan. 21. Intelligence of the disaster only reached St. John's to-day. She had a general cargo, and two passengers. The crew were all Americans, belonging in New-York and vicinity.

The officers and crew of the George Washington were as follows:

Captain—James Whitehead, Brooklyn.
First Officer—J. Krupp, Brooklyn.
Second Officer—Charles Dunn, New-York.
Quartermaster—Bernard Peterson, New-York.
Assistant Quartermaster—Lewis Jones, New-York.
Chief Engineer—Richard Hopper, New-York.
First Assistant Engineer—George L. Denton, Brooklyn.
Steward—James Lammond, Brooklyn.
George Phelan, seaman, New-York.
Thomas Nelson, Jr. seaman, New-York.
Robert H. Barry, seaman, New-York.
J. H. Berryman, seaman, Jersey City.
Robert Smith, seaman, Brooklyn.
John Sheehan, seaman, New-York.
Richard Halpin, seaman, New-York.
James Rathburo, seaman, New-York.
Jerry Riley, seaman, New-York.
Joseph Wolzi, seaman, New-York.
Patrick Caulfield, seaman, New-York.
William Estman, seaman, New-York.
Henry Whitman, seaman, New-York.
William O'Neill, seaman, Brooklyn.
Amelia McDonald, Brooklyn.

The passengers, two in number, were as follows:

W. Archibald, Halifax, cabin.
James Powers, Halifax, steerage.

At the office of Clark & Seaman, in this City, it is was learned that the cargo taken from this port to St. John's consisted of 2,700 barrels of flour, 800 barrels of beef and pork, 1,345 bags of wheat, 200 sides of leather, and 25 packages of sundries. At Halifax she took 40 packages of leather, 62 packages of furniture, 300 packages of fish, 190 packages of provisions, and 160 packages of sundries. The vessel was built in this City, in 1862, and was for a long time employed on the Cromwell Line in the New-Orleans trade. She was 184 feet in length, 30 feet breadth of beam, 18 feet 6 inches in depth, brigantine rigged, and propelled by a screw. She was of 989 tons burden, and was considered to be in good condition, having recently passed an inspection. She was valued at $90,000. Her principal owners were Clark & Seaman, and she was insured by them, but the amount of the insurance could not be ascertained last evening. The cargo was said to be insured by the shippers, but at the office of the Atlantic Mutual Insurance Company, although it was admitted that a small amount had been placed with that company on the George Washington, the entire insurance could not be ascertained. In the absence of both members of the firm from the office, not even an approximate estimate of the value of the vessel could be obtained. Capt. Whitehead is spoken of as an estimable man, an experienced and able master, and has long been in the employment of the Cromwell Line.

On her last trip from St. John's to Halifax on Dec. 30 last, the George Washington met with heavy gales, during which she was driven out of her course and was very much delayed. Her fuel becoming exhausted, the bulkheads were broken up to supply the furnaces, and 13 barrels of pork, a part of the cargo, were used for the same purpose.

The George Cromwell, of the same line, is now 34 days out from Halifax for St. John's. She was commanded by Capt. Bacon, of Brooklyn, and her other officers were Mr. Calkins, first officer, Brooklyn; Mr. Bacon, brother to the Captain,) second officer, Brooklyn; Mr. Wade, chief engineer. She carried as passengers from New-York to St. John's, William Skinner, New-Haven; Frank Archibald, Brooklyn, steerage; from Halifax to St. John's, W. H. Roper, F. H. Jordan, Charles E. Taylor, cabin, and E. Keen and John Doyle, steerage. The officers and crew numbered 24 all told. The Cromwell was surveyed in August, 1872. The Cromwell and Washington were mates, varying but little in tonnage.

THE KIERE MURDER TRIAL BEGUN

AN IMPORTANT WITNESS WANTED—POSTPONEMENT MOVED FOR—SEVEN JURORS OBTAINED.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

HUDSON, Feb. 5.—The case of John V. Kiere and Eleanore Kiere, his wife, jointly indicted for the murder of Charles H. Thompson, alias Charles H. Hermance, in this city, on Dec. 23, 1876, was called in the Over and Terminer this afternoon, Justice A. M. Osborn presiding. District Attorney Gershom Buckley, assisted by Hon. J. H. Longley, appeared for the people, and Hon. Charles L. Beale and J. Ryder Cady for the prisoners. An extra panel of 100 jurors had been summoned, and all but four answered to their names. Mr. Cady moved postponement till Tuesday morning, in consequence of the inability of the defense to subpœna James Carroll, a material witness, who was reported to be in Rondout. Mr. Cady stated that an officer had been dispatched for Carroll. The court denied the motion without prejudice to the defense, who will, in the event of Carroll not being found, renew it in the morning, when they will ask for a postponement over the term. The court thereupon proceeded to impanel a jury, and at 6 o'clock, at which time the court adjourned till Tuesday at 10 A. M., had secured the following jurors: Rufus Miller, Harvey Vandeusen, Elking Decker, John A. Snyder, William H. Gould, Nelson T. Gates, Henry D. Kitzell. Kiere and his wife, accompanied by their little daughter, a child of 5 years, were provided with seats within the Bar, and were the objects of the curious gaze of a crowded courtroom. Both Kiere and his wife are rather prepossessing in their appearance. The jurors called betrayed no reluctance to serve, and the defense were obliged to exhaust 15 of their peremptory challenges to prevent jurors with evident bias against the prisoner getting in the box. The feeling against Kiere is quite perceptible.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

PHILADELPHIA, Feb. 5.—A committee, consisting of Messrs. George S. Coe, President of the American Exchange National Bank; J. D. Vermilye, of the Merchants' National Bank; Benjamin B. Sherman, of the Merchants' National Bank of New-York; B. B. Comegys, President of the Philadelphia National Bank, and Enoch Pratt, of the Baltimore Farmers' and Planters' National Bank, met at the Continental Hotel to-night for the purpose of considering measures for the payment of the debts of the Southern States which have defaulted. The committee organized with Mr. Coe as Chairman, and adjourned to meet at the Fifth Avenue Hotel, in New-York, on Wednesday the 14th inst.

CLOSE OF ARGUMENT ON FLORIDA.

co-ordinate department of the Government, the Executive. All the world may count. No mortal man can doubt about the count. But the world is not called upon to act in relation to the count until that count has been recognised by some body, and officially recognised, and it is the duty of the House of Representatives at that point of time to determine whether an exigency has arisen which renders it its duty to recognise that a person is President by force of a majority of the legal votes, or whether there has been a failure to elect by reason of a tie, and in that event, if it occurs, the House of Representatives is bound at once to act and elect a President itself. The same observation applies to the Senate in reference to the Vice Presidency, and on that subject the Senate is called upon in like manner to recognize the fact of an election, to allow it, admit it, and accept it as a fact, or to deny it and say that it is not so, and then itself to proceed to elect a Vice President. I attach no importance to the word count, but I attach importance from the very nature of the thing, from the laws inwrought into the constitution of human beings and of human courts, to the fact that those who have to act officially are the persons who must do whatever may be needed for the purpose of enabling them to count and to act in the one direction or the other, as the case may require, in conformity with that count founded upon their preliminary investigation so far as any investigation may be necessary. Now the result of this construction is that the officer, who has no powers, is set aside, and confined in the exercise of any functions he may have to the narrow limits prescribed to him by the Constitution, and that the duty of exercising any higher function preliminary to this mere formal, indisputable sort of act, the counting devolves upon those who must take notice of the count. But no man or no body is authorised to make or to declare the count unless it be these two bodies respectively. And thus a power is introduced, not by implication of any forced nature, but from the absolute necessity of the case; and consequently we claim that the power is in those houses. Now it is not to be disputed, nor shall we question it here, nor make a special point about it, that Congress might, by united action, have constituted some body, or placed in some individual, a function by means of which this investigation might have been made, and how far Congress might have gone to make the action of this body obligatory we need not inquire. It is enough that, if the two houses had the power, they did not exercise it prior to this occasion, and have not otherwise exercised it than, subsequently to this difficulty, by the constitution of this tribunal, and in exercising it and vesting that power here the two houses have reserved to themselves the privilege of coming by a concurrent vote to a different determination from what may be here arrived at. Now, it is to be noticed that each of those bodies has complete power of investigation, adequate power to take proofs, through committees or otherwise, on any matter on which it may be obliged to pass, either before or after the opening of the Electoral votes. They can investigate, though not with the formalities of a jury nor under the precise forms of a judicial proceeding. But they can investigate, as political or legislative bodies may, all the facts and circumstances that are necessary to be known in order to enlighten their judgment and to guide them to a just and righteous decision.

INCONVENIENCE OF INVESTIGATION AS AN ARGUMENT.

Our construction thus vests in these two houses by a necessary implication, on such a contingency arising as is here presented, the power to do whatever may be needful for the accomplishment of justice. What is the objection to that construction? The whole argument against it resolves itself simply into the common every-day argument of the inconvenient—the inconvenientium ad inconvenientium. Those who would seek to grasp and hold office by illegal, irregular, unlawful, fraudulent means, claim that it would be inconvenient to take so much trouble as might be necessary in order to investigate, and rightly decide upon, on proofs the question of their delinquency and the falsity of their claim. This is the common plea of all the persons who set up a falsely or fraudulently contrived title, when an effort is made to strip them of their pretended authority by appeal before a court to appropriate tribunal the fallacy of their claim and the necessity to the end of justice of having that fallacy declared and their pretensions set aside. It is the only argument which such parties are ever able to offer; and now let us see how it stands as an argument, tested by the ordinary principles which we may gather from the experience of mankind and from our general knowledge. It is suggested that it might lead, if entered upon, must necessarily lead (if the parties see fit to do it) to an investigation of the personal qualifications of every one of the Electors among 45,000,000 people, and if you lay down the rule and adopt the principle that you have a right to investigate at all, you open the door to that inconvenient and boundless sea of litigation so that the mischiefs must necessarily be so great that it is better for power to injustice permit a usurper to enter by the most unholy of all avenues (the avenue of palpable and indisputable fraud) to the high seat of the Presidency of the United States; that it is better to submit to all that, or to any other more enormous evil, (if a more enormous one can be imagined,) than to submit to the shocking and monstrous inconvenience which would result from any attempt to inquire into the validity of the election. Now, let us see what there is in that broad presentation of overwhelming inconvenience. They say it is inconvenient; that that it need be inquired into here, but that it is impossible to tell what another party may desire to offer, (although we should limit our inquiries very much, indeed,) and that in laying down that principle of action you may establish the doctrine that this species of investigation, so vexatious and intolerable, may be warranted by law and may be allowed in practice. And it is so said from a very proper analogy, so far, because in a writ of quo warranto in the inquiry into the title of an individual to an office you may investigate all the particulars down to the qualification of every individual elector, and inasmuch as you may have in question the fact whether a particular voter was disqualified by reason of being an alien, you might there raise a question of identity (is being asserted that somebody else gave the vote) similar to that which took place in the Tichborne case, where, in determining a question of identity between two specified persons a whole year was consumed; and that, consequently, if that question were to arise in the great State of New-York as to the eligibility of a Judge, (say of the Court of Appeals,) in that case a similar sort of inquiry might be opened in regard to four hundred thousand persons, which is but one half the number of electors, and in presenting this "raw head and bloody bones," which is to frighten this court and the whole country from its propriety, we might suppose that in investigating the right of each one of the 400,000 electors it would take it 400,000 years, which would be a very long period for any court of justice to be engaged in trying a single case. [Laughter.] Now, the answer to all that is as simple as can be imagined. The objection you perceive applies as much to the ordinary writ of quo warranto in regard to ordinary officers as it does to this inquiry, if it should take place before Congress, for no court or set of courts could ever conduct within the compass of any human lifetime the investigation which might be necessary in determining the claim of a single officer. Therefore, this argumentum ad inconvenientiam is as fatal to the general procedure of courts of justice in actions of quo warranto as it is to the proceeding here suggested. But, if the learned Commission please, the investigation that may be allowed to take place before either house of Congress, or before any Commission appointed by them, would be governed by the same principles of general jurisprudence that apply to the doctrine of proceeding by quo warranto, and one of those principles is that no man has a right to the writ of quo warranto as of course or because he shows an apparent title. It has always been a matter of discretion. Numerous cases are cited here on the other side to show that it has been always treated as a matter of discretion. It is in the power of the supreme tribunal, acting in the name and majesty of the people, when applied to for a writ of quo warranto, to allow it or not, as under all the circumstances may be thought most consistent with the public interest, the ends of justice and the convenience of society, and the consequence this expanded inquiry can never take place on a writ of quo warranto. It never would be allowed, no court would ever permit the writ to issue, and never does so without a statement of the points intended to be argued, and, if it were necessary in allowing the writ, the court would lay a restraint on the party as to what point in question he must make, so that, in all investigations, judicial or otherwise, as to the right of particular individuals to hold or exercise a public office it is in the discretion of the tribunals to say how far they will go, and it is in your discretion, as it would be in the discretion of either house of Congress, acting for its own advice and direction as to the President and Vice President, to determine whether it would consent to permit an intolerable investigation of that description. So much for the argumentum ad inconvenientiam; it has no application. There never would be found a necessity for it. Standing on the ancient practices of the law the authority which might be called upon to institute an investigation would look at the difficulty presented, and say, under the influence of a due regard to the argumentum ad inconvenientiam, "Thus far you may go; no further shall you go."

NO LIMIT TO THE POWER TO INVESTIGATE.

Now, in regard to the legal question presented, as to what power each house of Congress had, under existing laws, and what powers, consequently, this Commission can exercise, we say, as the learned manager for the House stated in opening this case, that there is no technical legal limit or barrier to it, but that you exercise the same high power of the Government that has always been exercised in such questions, even in the courts of common law, to which application is made to obtain the writ of quo warranto. You exercise the same discretion, and you limit the inquiry (when the point arises) within those limits that are prescribed by necessity and convenience. This is our view, stated as fully as it is in our power to state it in the brief time I am permitted to occupy the attention of your Honors. We say that there is no limit to the power of investigation for the purpose of reaching the ends of justice, except such a due regard for public convenience and the interests of public justice and of society at large may impose, in the exercise of that discretionary authority. What is our condition and the condition of all cases of this kind? There is no judicial court in the United States clothed with authority to deal with the premises. We assert that without stopping to cite books and to prove it to you negatively. It seems to be conceded that if such a power might have been created it has remained dormant, and has not been exercised, and consequently we are told that here we stand, in the second century of this Republic's existence, in such a condition that there is no possible remedy against the most palpable fraud and forgery that can be perpetrated, or against any outrageous acts in violation of the rights of the people of the respective States and of the whole Union. We are told that there is no remedy; that Congress must sit by blindly and silently, and permit an alien to be counted into office as President of the United States; must sit by and permit a set of votes plainly and palpably fraudulent, (given by individuals not only disqualified by want of having been chosen by the citizens, but being themselves absolutely disqualified by the Constitution from acting in the offices, or from casting the vote,) to be counted, and must permit the usurpation contemplated to take place, merely because our wise fathers (one would think that the compliment was intended as sarcasm,) had so chosen to constitute the Government which they created, that injustice, however flagitious, might be perepetrated in open day, without the formality of having any remedy or of even uttering decorously a complaint. This, we humbly submit, cannot be the Constitution and the law. Reason forbids it. All acts, however solemn, however sacred, from whatever quarter coming, by whatever body perpetrated, are liable to review in some manner, in some judicial or other tribunal, so that fraud and falsehood may be unmasked and defeated and may fall in the attempt to trample on the right. It seems to be virtually conceded here that the Governor's certificate is not conclusive. I have not time to say much about that. It is not required by the Constitution. It is only required by an act of Congress. The Governor cannot be compelled to give it; many circumstances may prevent his giving it, and he may have given it under circumstances of plainly flagitious falsehood without any election, without any proceeding and to sanction it. He may have given his certificate to his four little boys, and constituted them an Electoral College, and the vote which they gave, pursuant to his bidding, and by force of his certificate, would become absolutely conclusive and binding on all the authorities of the United States who had any power to act in the premises. I submit to your Honors that that is not so, and I beg you to turn (when you come to consider this matter) to the citation of Armistead's case in Mr. Green's brief—15 Peters, 594—where the Supreme Court, speaking by the voice of Judge Story, pronounced all transactions, of every description, however solemn, impeachable for fraud and capable of being reversed. In the case of the State of Michigan against the Phœnix Bank (33d New-York Reports, page 27) your Honors will find that the most solemn judgment of any court may be overthrown and reviewed, and be shown to have been procured by a trick, a deception, or a falsehood, and may be completely reversed and defeated. The inquiry then is how far are we to go in this case? The Florida laws to which you have been referred show that it may not be necessary to go further (and we have asserted that it will not be necessary to go further) than to make a collection of the unlawful extra jurisdictional acts of the canvassing board. You may not (when you come to look at this law, which is contained in a little document placed before you) consider that there is any such sanctity attending the action of this State Board as is supposed. The law is that "If any such returns (the county returns) shall be shown, or shall appear, to be so irregular, false, or fraudulent as that the board is unable to determine the true vote of any such officer or member, they shall so certify, and shall include such return in their determination and declaration, and the Secretary of State shall preserve and file in this office all such returns, together with such other documents and papers as may have been before the Board of Canvassers, one of which will be the certificate of their action, rejecting those returns." The law itself provides for and contemplates an investigation of the action of the Board of State Canvassers. Turning back to the law in relation to the Board of County Canvassers, you may find that neither of these bodies has any power whatever, except simply to compute and return the vote as received. Such is the case as to the primary Board of Canvassers, and the second Board of Canvassers and the last and ultimate Board of Canvassers, and these very limited powers they seem to have exercised only in regard to one single county. They rejected some little fragments of three other counties, but did not exercise the power of rejecting the whole of these returns, which was the only power that they possessed. In regard to the one single county they seem to have acted by some possibility within the limits of their power and authority. It might be supposed that they did so, but we propose to show that they did not. We will show it by their own certificate, which the law compels them to fill, and to place along with the counts which they made and which, from a short, brief, and simple inquiry, will demonstrate the unreality of the fact which we seek to set aside. We claim that the quo warranto is admissible. You will perceive by looking at that same statute to which we have referred that unless the Electors are State officers this Canvassing Board had no authority whatever to deal with the subject, and when you would be called upon to disregard the canvass which they made and to look at the county returns, which the law does in terms authorize to be made in reference to Presidential Electors as well as to State officers. Well, if the Electors are State officers, certainly they were subject to correction by the State, if there was any means or contrivance by which they can be corrected at all, and the familiar, ordinary, regular course of proceedings by quo warranto was commenced in due season before they had actually cast their vote, and their authority was determined to be utterly void and annulled, and that long before their votes had reached the seat of Government or could possibly have been subject to count. If they are not State officers, then we have done with the canvass of the State Board, and have only to look (in case you pass by the Governor's certificate) to the next element of proof, and that is the whole set of county returns, which, being footed up, would show the result to be, as we claim, that the Governor's certificate was utterly false. Subsequent legislation has been presented before the House, and a subsequent investigation for the purpose of a new canvass has been had to be laid before the House. Indeed, it is already before this Commission in the original document opened by the President of the Senate. We claim that on these principles and on these proofs, and such further proofs as may be offered to you, (subject only to the restraint which may be referred to, and which you may exercise in your decision,) you have the right to investigate this matter, and to determine two things—first, whether the Hayes Electoral vote is valid, and second, whether the Tilden vote is valid. The final decision at which you may arrive may reject either, or may reject both. They are not involved in precisely the same questions necessarily. Different questions may possibly apply, and the vote for Mr. Hayes may be pronounced invalid, and the vote for Mr. Tilden equally so. I have not time to discuss more fully the question as to setting the Tilden vote in case the Hayes vote may be rejected. In the little time left to me I have hardly an opportunity of saying a word in regard to that which is the main reliance of the other side, and that is the doctrine of officer de facto.

The Presiding Justice—You have 35 minutes left.

THE DE FACTO OFFICER.

Mr. O'Conor—I am very much delighted to find that I have so much time left, because it is probable, although contrary to my intentions, that I may have exhausted my time unnecessarily. I have no desire, however, to ask for any more time, for I feel that any powers which I possess are fully tasked in filling up the time allowed me, brief though it be. Now, as to this doctrine of an officer de facto, what is that? The best definition of an officer de facto which I have fallen in with is that given by Lord Ellenborough in the case of the King against the Corporation of Bedford Level. (7 C. East., 368.) An officer de facto, he says, is one who has the reputation of being the officer he seems to be, and yet is not a good officer in point of law. He is one who has clothed himself with the reputation of being an officer. In relation to that individual, that person, the law with its wise conservatism has declared that during the period when the person pretending title to the office was in apparent possession of all the powers and functions and exercised the duties of it, his acts, as respects persons who in the ordinary course of things were obliged to recognize him and to act under his authority with his powers, shall be esteemed valid; that individuals must not be deceived by that species of disorder or temporary insurrection which has broken in upon the functions of government. It is the duty of individuals, and they are now under the necessity also, for their own business purposes, if there were these existing authorities having this color of right, and if these are the only authorities to which they can refer, to refer to them, and in that action of theirs, as a reward for their humble obedience and respect for order, regularity, and the apparent law, they are held to be entitled to protection, and in all forms, ways, and places they are protected. That that is the precise relation in respect to this class of officers I would take leave to prove by referring to Green against Bunker, 23d Wendel, 503, where there is a very able opinion written by one of the most elaborate investigators of legal authority that I have ever known or heard of—Judge Cullom, formerly of the State of New-York. He examined the authorities, and what he says is that the cases, to be sure, "have gone pretty far. I know," he says, "that the cases have gone a good ways, but they have stopped with preventing mischief to such as confided in the officers, who were acting without right." That is the summing of the authorities and of the principle. Now, what is the proposition here contended for? That these officers, having acted under color of right, and having completely exercised and perfected the function with which they appear (it is said) to be charged, and with which, if they were duly elected, they were charged, any subsequent attempt to set it aside would be contrary to that principle, contrary to convenience, and mischievous to society. Now, is that so? Is not that principle of necessity confined to acts affecting private persons? Is it not of necessity confined to cases where the act of the officer de facto is consummated and perfected, and has taken effect in some manner before it is ascertained that he is not entitled to his office and he is ousted? Are the bank notes of a bank not having authority to issue them, although signed, and perfect, and furnished, and put in the hands of an agent, valid and effectual under this principle, until some person has confided in them, and has received them, and been thus misled by the appearance of right with which the bank had improperly clothed itself. Now, we maintain that neither the public good nor the protection of men from deception, nor any rule of convenience or policy requires the allowance of pretended Electors, whose title, on investigation by competent authority, has received them, and been opened and counted, has been ascertained to be groundless. Referring to the facts of the case, what do we find? These four gentlemen sit down with a false Governor's certificate, or a sham certificate from a Board of State canvassers, and they of their own authority, certifying their acts themselves, cast four votes in a given direction, put them in a packet, and send it to an officer who cannot look at it until the time of its presentation, for the purpose of being considered and counted. Before that time arrived at which that act of ours could receive any body could have any opposition, could take effect, could get into such a condition that its preservation and maintenance were necessary for the cause of public justice or private right, their lack of title was ascertained; by a solemn writ of quo warranto it was determined that they were usurpers; that they had no right to the office, and that their acts were void. Is there any such principle as that the inchoate, partial action of an officer de facto shall be carried forward and go to its perfection by the acceptance of the act as a due and valid act after the invalidity of that officer's claim has been established? Whether we repose on the quo warranto under your Honor's allowance or repose on proof which may be here offered, admitted, and passed upon by your Honors for the purpose of showing the utter invalidity of those gentlemen's claims to the office of Electors, or in whatever shape this matter is presented or carried forward, the act of these officers de facto fails to have reached the point where it can have or take any effect, or can deceive or mislead anybody, and it is shown, and established by competent means to be an act of those who had no authority to perform it. The position of the thing is very striking in that single aspect which the other side has assumed. The act of an undoubted, undisputed, convicted usurper claimed to be received and to have an effect which if has as yet never had, because as the time they put for four little boys, and constituted them an Electoral College, and the vote which they gave, pursuant to his bidding, and by force of his certificate, would become absolutely conclusive and binding on all the authorities of the United States who had any power to act in the premises. I submit to your Honors that that is not so, and I beg you to turn (when you come to consider this matter) to the citation of Armistead's case in Mr. Green's brief—15 Peters, 594—where the Supreme Court, speaking by the voice of Judge Story, pronounced all transactions, of every description, however solemn, impeachable for fraud and capable of being reversed. In the case of the State of Michigan against the Phœnix Bank (33d New-York Reports, page 27) your Honors will find that the most solemn judgment of any court may be overthrown and reviewed, and be shown to have been procured by a trick, a deception, or a falsehood, and may be completely reversed and defeated. The inquiry then is how far are we to go in this case? The Florida laws to which you have been referred show that it may not be necessary to go further (and we have asserted that it will not be necessary to go further) than to make a collection of the unlawful extra jurisdictional acts of the canvassing board. You may not (when you come to look at this law, which is contained in a little document placed before you) consider that there is any such sanctity attending the action of this State Board as is supposed. The law is that "If any such returns (the county returns) shall be shown, or shall appear, to be so irregular, false, or fraudulent as that the board is unable to determine the true vote of any such officer or member, they shall so certify, and shall include such return in their determination and declaration, and the Secretary of State shall preserve and file in this office all such returns, together with such other documents and papers as may have been before the Board of Canvassers, one of which will be the certificate of their action, rejecting those returns." The law itself provides for and contemplates an investigation of the action of the Board of State Canvassers. Turning back to the law in relation to the Board of County Canvassers, you may find that neither of these bodies has any power whatever, except simply to compute and return the vote as received. Such is the case as to the primary Board of Canvassers, and the second Board of Canvassers and the last and ultimate Board of Canvassers, and these very limited powers they seem to have exercised only in regard to one single county. They rejected some little fragments of three other counties, but did not exercise the power of rejecting the whole of these returns, which was the only power that they possessed. In regard to the one single county they seem to have acted by some possibility within the limits of their power and authority. It might be supposed that they did so, but we propose to show that they did not. We will show it by their own certificate, which the law compels them to fill, and to place along with the counts which they made and which, from a short, brief, and simple inquiry, will demonstrate the unreality of the fact which we seek to set aside. We claim that the quo warranto is admissible. FLOUR AND MEAL—The general movement in State and Western Flour was very tame, the export call having been as a rule limited, and the home trade inquiry light, and prices were quoted weaker and somewhat irregular, though the reported changes were not important. Much of the business on export account was in City Mill product for the West India markets, very little trade, even in this class, having been reported for South America, and no transactions for the English interest. Receivers were more urgent in their offerings of most descriptions.....Sales have been reported since our last of 20,200 bbls. of all grades, including about 8,000 bbls. at $3 50@$6 75 for Superfine and Extra State; $3 50@$6 75 for Superfine and Extra Western; $5 40@$6 65; very poor to choice, No. 2 at $4 25@$5. (of wh ch 100 bbls. choice White Wheat at Buffalo, from dock, at $5;) very poor to very choice Rye mixture Western, $5 40@$6 80, mainly at $5 00@$5 75; poor to fair Extra State, $5 80@$6; fair to choice do. at $6@$6 35; City Mills Extra, shipping grades, $5 90@$7, nearly all for West Indies; fair to choice do. at $6 75@$7 75; good to very choice, (with higher rates named for small lots of very choice fancy,) and quoted at $8@$8 50 for about choice to fancy, for the seconds American trade, and principally quoted at $5 90 for brands suited to the English trade: very inferior to fair shipping Extra Western, $5 75@$5; fair to choice do., $6@$6 30; very poor to very choice Western Trade and Family Extras, spring Wheat stock, $6 25@$8 50; interior to very choice do. do., red and Amber Winter Wheat stock, at $6 27@$8 50; part for shipment at $6 65@$. City Mills; 850 bbls. Minnesota clear and straight Extras; 350 bbls. Genesee Extra; 500 bbls. Winter Wheat Extras, (for shipment;) 5-5 bbls. superfine and 450 bbls. The dealings were mostly in Extr a at from $7 25@$8 25.....Rye Flour has been very quiet, receivers reporting sales of only odd lotes to the local jobbing interest at former rates.....We quote at from $5 40@$5 20 for poor Western to very choice State Superfine, and $5@$4 for poor to choice Fine.....Sales reported at 135 bbls., in small lots, chiefly at $4 75@$5 for fair to good, and $5 25 for Superfine in part; $5 10@$5 20 for choice to very choice; $4 70@$5 for Pennsylvania, the latter for choice and $4 50@$5 for about fair to very choice Western.....Corn-meal has been in limited request at previous prices.....We quote at $2 90@$3 15 for inferior to very choice Yellow Western; $2 75@$3 10 for Yellow Jersey; $3 60 for Yellow Baltimore; and $3 60 for Brandywine.....Sales have been reported of 475 bbls., including 275 bbls. Chicago stronger under speculative control. Corn was rather less active; new crop yielded slightly on free offerings. PROPOSALS.

PROPOSALS FOR ADHESIVE POSTAGE STAMPS.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
Jan. 25, 1877.

Sealed proposals are invited from steel-plate engravers and plate printers, and will be received at this department until 12 o'clock M. on Wednesday, the 28th day of February, 1877, for furnishing all the postage stamps which this department may require for public and official use during a period of four years, commencing on the 1st day of May, 1877, viz:

1. Stamps for the use of the public.
2. Official stamps for the use of the executive departments.
3. Newspaper and periodical stamps.

QUALITY OF STAMPS.

The stamps must be furnished, subject to the approval of the department, from steel plates, engraved in the highest style of the art of steel engraving, and printed in such colors as may from time to time be selected by the department, in the best and most approved manner, upon paper of the best quality, suitable for the purpose and satisfactory to the department, thoroughly gummed with the best quality of adhesive gum, perforated in such manner that each separate stamp can be readily detached and used, the sheets to be well pressed, and packed so as to prevent them from adhering to each other; the same to be furnished with all reasonable dispatch in such quantities as may in each case be ordered by the department daily to fill requisitions from Postmasters and from the executive departments. The stamps must be printed on hand-roller presses.

DIES, ROLLS, AND PLATES.

The dies, rolls, and plates from which postage stamps are now printed, being the property of the United States, will be placed in the keeping and custody of the contractor on or before the first day of May, 1877, the same to be held subject to the order and control of the department, as hereinafter provided; and the contractor will be required, from said dies, rolls, and plates, and from such other plates as may be necessary to be reproduced from the original dies, to have on hand, ready for issue on the day the contract term commences, a sufficient stock of stamps of the several denominations required, to fill the then current daily requisitions from the department, without hindrance or delay.

The contractor will be further required to keep in repair all dies, rolls, and plates from which stamps may be printed, and to renew the same whenever required; and should new designs be required at any time to take the place of the present series of stamps the same will be furnished by the contractor, or for the denominations of stamps not now in use, the same shall be furnished and engraved, subject to the approval of the Postmaster General, upon his request, within a reasonable time; all which dies, rolls, and plates shall be the best style of steel engraving by the contractor, and at his own expense. No change will be made in the present designs of official postage stamps, or of newspaper and periodical stamps; but the contractor will be required to keep in repair, and renew when required, the dies, rolls, and plates for these stamps, the same as for the stamps for the use of the public. All dies, rolls, and plates made at any time in filling the contract shall immediately become the absolute property of the United States, and shall be delivered, in good working order, to the Postmaster General or his authorized agent whenever demanded.

BUILDING, PLACE OF MANUFACTURE, &c.

The stamps will be required to be manufactured in a fire-proof building, and in separate apartments, distinct from those in which any other work is done by the contractor—the whole to be subject to the approval of the department—and when finished must be placed in a fire and burglar-proof safe or vault, to be specially provided for that purpose, and constructed to the satisfaction of the department. The contractor, his employes, and agents shall conform to such regulations as the department may from time to time adopt for the security of the Government.

AGENT—OFFICE-ROOMS—INSPECTION.

A resident agent of the department will have supervision of the manufacture, storage, and issue of the stamps, who shall at all times have full and free access to the apartments, safes, and vaults where the stamps are manufactured and stored, for the purpose of inspecting the same; and the contractor shall furnish him and his clerks suitable office and desk room, for the transaction of the business of his agency, without cost to the Government. The Postmaster General shall also have the right at any time to cause an inspection to be made, by any agent or agents whom he may specially designate for the purpose, of the apartments, safes, and vaults used for the manufacture and storage of stamps and of the stamps in course of manufacture or in stock.

STOCK ON HAND.

The contractor shall at all times keep on hand a stock of the several denominations and kinds of stamps, subject to the control of the Post Office Department, its regularly authorized agent, or such other agents as may be specially authorized by the Postmaster General, in all stages of manufacture, sufficient to meet all orders of the department, and to provide against any and all contingencies that may be likely to occur during the existence of the contract, so that each and every order of the department may be promptly filled, and the department shall have the right to require the contractor at any time during the existence of the contract to furnish an extra quantity of stamps not exceeding a supply for three months.

PACKING.

Stamps to be transmitted by sea routes must be securely packed in hermetically sealed tin cases, wrapped in strong manila paper; all others must either be packed in strong binders'-board boxes, bound on the edges with strong manila, and enveloped in two thicknesses of strong manila paper, or inclosed in strong manila envelopes, as the quantity to be transmitted may require; all packages to be so inclosed as to enable the agent of the department to officially seal them.

DELIVERY

A RECEIVER'S ACCOUNTS.

AFFAIRS OF THE CONTINENTAL LIFE.

EXAMINATION BY THE REFEREE—IRREGULAR TRANSACTIONS BROUGHT TO LIGHT—HOW RECEIVER ANDERSON TRUSTED OFFICERS OF THE COMPANY—AN ALLEGED "RAISED" MORTGAGE—WILLIAM R. GRACE APPOINTED RECEIVER IN PLACE OF MR. ANDERSON.

The hearing before Mr. William Allen Butler, the Referee appointed by Justice Pratt to inquire into the condition of the assets of the Continental Life Insurance Company of this City, and to examine and pass upon the accounts of the Receiver, John J. Anderson, was resumed yesterday at No. 20 Nassau street.

Mr. George W. Thomas, the book-keeper of the company, was the first witness called, and was put through a rigid examination by Mr. Ira D. Warren, representing several policyholders, relating to the transfer of stock made some time before the Receiver's appointment, by Mr. Wynkoop, one of the Directors, to John O. Hoyt, at whose suit Judge Pratt appointed Mr. Anderson. The transfer-book, which could not be found for a long time, was handed to the witness, and, in response to questions, he stated that it contained no record of a transfer of stock from M. B. Wynkoop to John O. Hoyt. The stock ledger was produced with the same result, and the certificate-book was afterward given to the witness, and in this was found the only record of the transaction, and that in the shape of a certificate, to the effect that John O. Hoyt was the owner of 15 shares of stock. The certificate, which was numbered 44, the witness said was first found attached to the stub of No. 66. On the back of it was the indorsement, "M. B. Wynkoop to John O. Hoyt," in the handwriting of the Secretary. This, it may be stated, was in direct violation of section 28 of the company's by-laws:

Mr. Raphael J. Moses, of counsel, stated that he desired to put in evidence the certificate of incorporation of the Pavilion and United States Spring Company, of Saratoga, three of the Directors of which were also Directors of the Continental Life Insurance Company, namely, Luther W. Frost, Justus Lawrence, and G. Hilton Scribner. It is stated that the Continental had, among its mortgages, one on the property of the above-named company for $25,000, and that the records of Saratoga County show its amount to have originally been only $1,500.

The next witness was Mr. John J. Anderson, the retiring Receiver, who handed in a statement of his accounts. Mr. Van Pelt, as counsel for several of the policy holders, then began an examination of Mr. Anderson, in relation to some of the items contained in the statement, during the course of which he said he would like to see the company's mortgages. Mr. Anderson left the room to get them, and returning in a few minutes said he could not find the key of the safe in which the bonds and mortgages were kept; Mr. L. V. Styles, the Cashier, had it in his possession, and had gone out. The announcement was then made that Mr. Styles, who lives in Orange, N. J., had gone home, and the key could not be procured. During the examination that followed, Mr. Anderson stated that Mr. Styles had always, since he [the witness] had taken possession of the company's affairs, had the key of the safe in his possession, and was the only one who knew the combination of the lock on the vault doors, the mortgages being contained in a smaller inside safe. This created considerable surprise, and afforded some little amusement when the Receiver stated that when he wished to enter the vaults he was obliged to go, if they were locked, to the Cashier, as he did not know the combination. Mr. Moses then asked that the name of Mr. Styles be called, and if he failed to answer, that an attachment be issued against him, but this was not done. The mortgage-book of the company was produced, and a list of the mortgages made by the Receiver, when he entered the office, was also procured. In the book was found an entry of a mortgage for $17,500 from Sarah P. and G. Hilton Scribner to the Continental Life Insurance Company, which was marked "not here." On being interrogated as to the meaning of these words, the witness stated that he had found the envelope in which the mortgage should have been, but the instrument itself was gone. On the back of the envelope was an indorsement in lead pencil, "Empire Stock," and the witness said he had made inquiries concerning this, but was unable to obtain any satisfaction. It is generally believed and the Receiver gave it as his opinion that the indorsement referred to stock of the Empire Life Insurance Company, absorbed some years ago by the Continental. The mortgages on his list, the witness stated, amounted to $1,016,000. He had a loan from the company of $4,000, which he negotiated with Mr. Frost in June, 1875, the loan being made on a mortgage for $8,500. He had not paid interest on this loan, because he had not been called upon to pay it. The loan was finally paid in cash, and the mortgage taken up in May, 1876.

Mr. Van Pelt then examined the witness at length regarding the counsel fees he had paid since his appointment, first upon the list being G. W. Miller, to whom he paid $500. Mr. Miller, he stated, had been employed to attend to the matters of the company in Albany; Mr. Daniel Magone was paid $1,000 for attendance in the same case; William Fullerton received $5,000 for attending to the same case and for general advice; S. A. & D. J. Noyes received $753 15 for matters generally, and several other persons received divers amounts for like services, the total being over $11,000; one of these items, $500, was paid to A. Q. Keasley, the witness stated, for attending to the foreclosure of a $30,000 mortgage, which was first in the hands of S. A. & D. J. Noyes, and was sent by them to him; this was before the appointment of the witness as Receiver; the mortgage was on the property of the United States Watch Company; Mr. Keasley, the witness said, had come to him and stated that he wanted $500 for disbursements which he would be compelled to make, and he had given him a check for that amount without consulting counsel, believing that he had a right to do so; John L. Hill received $1,100, and Messrs. Sewell and Pierce $2,000 for attendance to business generally. In speaking of the services performed by Mr. Fullerton the witness said he had brought suit for him against the New-Jersey Mutual Life Insurance Company for the recovery of the securities transferred to it by the Continental. The witness could not say whether the suit had been brought in this State or in New-Jersey, and was not sure whether or not he had read the papers; the amount sued for was $314,900, and Mr. Fullerton had informed him that he had recovered $102,000, which he was at present holding subject to the order of the court. Mr. Van Pelt, pursuing his examination, asked the Receiver if he did not know when he employed Sewell and Pierce that they were the counsel for John O. Hoyt, at whose suit he was appointed, and he replied that he did not. He was in court when the application for his appointment was made, and engaged them as counsel on the same day.

Mr. Moses asked the witness if he remembered the vault having been opened on Sunday, three weeks ago, and he replied, "No, Sir." "Do you not know," said Mr. Moses, "that the vault was opened during your absence from the building?" To this Mr. Anderson replied that he did, or at least that he understood such was the case; he believed some one in the office had told him of it. This was a totally unlooked for disclosure, and occasioned considerable surprise, besides showing the carelessness of the Receiver in allowing any of the former employes of the concern to retain the keys to the safes in their possession. Mr. Moses continued his examination, and elicited the fact that Luther W. Frost, the former President of the company, Rufus C. Frost, Daniel J. Noyes, an attorney, and Styles, the Cashier, together with some others, had entered the vault on the day in question, for the purpose, as had been explained to the witness, of getting some private letters which were locked up there; the witness was very incignant at the time, he said, and had told Mr. Styles that he had done a very "imprudent" thing; notwithstanding this fact, he had since allowed him to retain the combination, and had unlimited confidence in his integrity. Commenting upon the fact that Mr. Styles had gone home at a very opportune time, Mr. Moses asked the witness if he was not aware of the fact that Mr. Styles had gone to his lawyer to consult as to what answers he should make at the hearing then in progress, to which he replied that he did not; he, [the witness,] did not have an interview with Styles a short time prior to the meeting, nor did he know what induced him to go away; he never knew Mr. Styles intimately until he was made Receiver; did not remember exactly what explanation Mr. Styles had given him regarding the clandestine visit of the thieves. Frost to the building; he first learned of it about a week ago, he thought, but Mr. Styles had probably mentioned it to him on the day following the occurrence. To Mr. Sewell the witness stated that there were no securities in the safe that were transferable by delivery; they could not have stolen anything that would be of any use to them, and to another of the counsel he stated that there were stock-notes in the safe which were not put in as assets, because he could not find out whether there was anything due on them or not. The hearing was then adjourned.

In the suit of John O. Hoyt against the Continental Insurance Company, in which John J. Anderson was appointed Receiver on Oct. 25, 1876, Judge Calvin E. Pratt yesterday made an order granting the prayer of the Receiver's petition that his resignation be accepted, and a Referee appointed to pass his accounts, and appointing Mr. William R. Grace, Receiver.

Mr. William R. Grace, the newly appointed Receiver, is the senior member of the firm of William R. Grace & Co., bankers and commission merchants, at No. 66 Pine street. Mr. Grace is very wealthy, and stands at the very head of his class of merchants. The affairs of the Continental Life will, therefore, doubtless be administered in a way that will give satisfaction to all, which the retiring Receiver has failed to do.

COLLISION ON THE NEW-JERSEY CENTRAL.

Two trains on the New-Jersey Central Railway collided yesterday morning near the Communipaw Station, but fortunately the accident was not attended by any loss of life. Both trains, one from Newark and the other from Elizabeth, are due at Communipaw at 7:25, and the Elizabeth engineer has instructions to lay up on the track until the Newark train passes the junction. Yesterday the instructions were not thought of, and the trains kept on until the junction was reached, when the Newark train was knocked from the track. Mr. L. J. Bridgman, of Bergen, a passenger on the Newark train, and one of the brakemen, were the only persons injured. The damage to the cars was about $500.

THE STATE LEGISLATURE.

A NUMBER OF BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS INTRODUCED—THE THIRD DISTRICT COURT-HOUSE—TAXATION OF BONDS AND MORTGAGES.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

ALBANY, Feb. 5.—When the House met this evening, the bill in relation to the office of Superintendent of Public Works came up, being the special order. The House was thin, however, and Mr. Baker moved that the consideration of the bill go over till Wednesday, which was done. In a few minutes the evening train brought in a crowd of members, and the House went on with its regular business. A number of bills and resolutions were introduced. Mr. Gilbert, of Franklin, offering one which requires the Committee on Rules to inquire into the expediency of amending the rules so as to forbid the introduction of bills after the 15th of March, except by unanimous consent. Mr. Bradley offered a resolution, which went over, that the daily sessions commence at 10 instead of 11 o'clock as now. He wanted to get through earlier than 2 o'clock, since the committees have to meet at 3. The bill providing for the completion of the Third District Court-house was sent to the Committee on Cities with orders to report in three days. The recommittal was made to allow Mr. Porter, of the commission, to be heard before the committee, he having desired to make a statement. Mr. Hepburn, of St. Lawrence, introduced a bill in relation to the taxation of bonds and mortgages, the intent of it being to prevent the double taxation of property which now exists in some cases. It provides that bonds and mortgages shall be liable to assessment and taxation where the property is situated, and not elsewhere. Any person owning mortgaged property shall be entitled to have deducted from the assessed valuation of such property the amount unpaid upon any mortgage or mortgages that are actually valid and subsisting liens upon said property at the time of the assessment. The remaining section of the bill provides for its enforcement.

In the Senate, Senator Wagstaff introduced a bill authorizing the taxation of stockholders in banks, and the surplus of savings banks; also a bill to enable Receivers of savings banks to put their causes in the preferred calendar of the Supreme Court and Court of Appeals. A bill was ordered to a third reading giving to the Foundling Asylum of the Sisters of Charity the same sum per month for the support of the mothers residing at the asylum and nursing their own infants as is now paid the New-York infant asylums for similar inmates; also authorizing the asylum to purchase and hold real estate to the extent of $75,000 in any county contiguous to New-York City.

The following bills were passed in the Assembly: Authorizing a tax of one-third of a mill per dollar to provide for a deficiency in the sinking fund; amending the act relating to the compensation of Presidential Electors; an act, making it the duty of town and ward collectors to receive at par county orders in payment of taxes; amending an act to alter the Commissioners' map of the City of Brooklyn; amending the act regulating the deposit of securities by plate-glass insurance companies.

THE NEW-JERSEY LEGISLATURE.

PROPOSED ABOLITION OF THE COMMITTEE FOR THE GOVERNMENT OF CITIES—A BILL FOR THE RELIEF OF TWO CONDEMNED MURDERERS.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

TRENTON, Feb. 5.—In the Senate this evening Senator Ward introduced for President Abbett a bill abolishing the legislative Committee for the Government of Cities. The bill is especially designed to affect Jersey City. The first section declares that the terms of office of all the Commissioners shall end on the first Monday succeeding the next charter election. The second section provides for each of the legislative boards which now control the city. There shall be a board of three members, to be elected by the people at the coming Spring election, and to hold office for two years. The voters of the city at large are to vote for only two members of each board. The three receiving the highest number of votes are to constitute such board. The bill went through the Committee on Municipal Corporations in about five minutes, and was put on its second reading. It will be called up and passed to-morrow.

Senator Magie introduced a bill this evening, and within half an hour it had passed that body, designed especially for the relief of Oschwald and Ryan, the murderers of Officer Brock, for whose execution in Newark on Friday preparations are being made. Senator Magie is one of the counsel of the doomed men, and has worked indefatigably in their behalf. It will doubtless be passed by the House and signed by the Governor to-morrow, and the execution, which was to have taken place next Friday, will be postponed for a few weeks.

Mr. Drohan's bill for the ousting of all Republicans from office in Jersey City, was called up on second reading, but at his request was recommitted, and will probably be withdrawn.

The Republicans held a joint caucus this evening, and concluded to agree to go into joint meeting whenever the Democrats desire. Some discussion was had also over the charter proposed by Senator Abbett this evening.

DANGER ON THE SUSQUEHANNA.

IMMENSE ICE-GORGES AT HAVRE DE GRACE, PORT DEPOSIT, AND OTHER POINTS—RAILROAD TRACKS AND OUT-HOUSES SWEPT AWAY—A GREAT LOSS OF PROPERTY APPREHENDED.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

BALTIMORE, Feb. 5.—From the effects of the mild weather and recent warm rains the ice-fields of the Susquehanna River have become weakened, and are showing signs of a speedy dissolution. The fields extend from the bridge of the Philadelphia, Wilmington and Baltimore Railroad at Havre de Grace 50 miles up the river. At Port Deposit the greatest danger is apprehended. This town is one mile above the bridge on the north side, fronting directly upon the river, with a high bluff in the rear, and is nearly two miles long. Its situation makes it peculiarly liable to floods. When the ice in the river first moved yesterday immense cakes came crashing over the wharves, carrying with it lumber, small out-houses, and all other obstructions, and over the ice came floods of water. The dwellings upon the lower streets of the town are partly submerged, and the terrified residents are moving higher up on the hillside. To-night the ice is piled on the wharves and on the tracks of the Baltimore and Central and Philadelphia, Wilmington and Baltimore Railroads 20 feet high, while the water is receding. On the river front masses of jagged cakes have gorged the river to such an extent that the southern shore is obscured. At the first signs of the break the railroad companies removed all their rolling stock from the depots. They are running no trains to the town, and passengers are compelled to walk two miles before taking train. The tracks of the Central Road have been torn up for a mile above the jeopardized village and far below the town. A large force of hands have been engaged in cutting through the ice piled upon the tracks of the Philadelphia, Wilmington, and Baltimore Road. The ice is gorged heavily at Hog Bank, five miles, and Canal Station, two miles above the town. The gorge from which the most danger is anticipated is at McCall's Ferry, 25 miles above. If this should give way suddenly a tremendous mass of ice and water will be precipitated upon the town, which will undoubtedly cause an immense loss of property and perhaps life. At the ferry the ice is 35 feet high, and still massing. On the opposite side of the river—the Harford County shore—the residents of Lapidum are also much alarmed. The water and ice have risen above the canal banks 20 feet, and the county roads are flooded. At Port Deposit the residents are busily engaged in vacating their dwellings and removing furniture and valuables. The gorge in the river grows more formidable every hour, and the anxiety and fear of the residents increases in anticipation of a repetition of the terrible floods of 1872 and 1875, when immense damage was done.

MAXWELL PUT ON HIS DEFENSE.

THE CASE FOR THE PROSECUTION CLOSED—THE MOTION TO DISCHARGE DENIED—EVIDENCE FOR THE DEFENSE.

The examination in the case of George L. Maxwell, the broker charged with complicity in negotiating the forged check for $64,295 drawn on the Union Trust Company, was resumed yesterday morning at the Tombs Police Court, before Justice Duffy. Assistant District Attorney William H. Herring and Mr. Wheeler H. Peckham appeared for the prosecution, and Mr. Clarence A. Seward and Gen. John A. Foster, for Maxwell, who came into the court-room supported on crutches and accompanied by his brothers John D. and James W. Mr. Peckham called Mr. Theodore M. Banta, Cashier of the New-York Life Insurance Company, who testified that the punched figures in the forged check differed somewhat from those made in the genuine checks; the forged check was shorter than the genuine checks.

H. A. Brachvogel, a clerk of the New York Life Insurance Company, called by Mr. Peckham, testified as follows: I have known Maxwell for some years; Maxwell and Gen. John A. Foster came to my room in the company's office between 9 and 11 o'clock on the morning of the 3d of January; Gen. Foster asked me who was Cashier of the company, and I told him that Mr. Banta was; Mr. Maxwell asked me the same question; showed me a letter signed by some name which I do not remember; he asked me if that was the name of the Cashier, and I told him it was not; the letter was folded so that I could not see the top; the name shown was not the name of any officer of the company; I saw figures for a large amount on the letter, I think about $50,000; Gen. Foster said to Maxwell that he had better go down and see "Franklin;" I understood Gen. Foster to say something to Maxwell either about a forgery or a forged check passed upon Maxwell.

Morris Franklin, President of the New-York Life Insurance Company, called by Mr. Peckham, testified: That is not my signature on the forged check; I did not know Maxwell until he was pointed out to me here; he never made any inquiries of me relative to the check; our company never bought gold.

To Mr. Seward—The Union Trust Company did not present the forged check to our office nor make any inquiries about it on the 2d of January; I never signed checks in blank; I first saw the forged check about the 20th of December; my attention was called to it by Mr. Banta; as soon as I found it was a forgery I sent word to the Union Trust Company.

Mr. Peckham—That is our case.

Mr. Seward asked for the discharge of Maxwell, on the ground that the evidence for the prosecution did not show that the check was ever in his possession, or that he had any reason to believe that it was not genuine.

Mr. Peckham opposed the motion to discharge, saying that Maxwell had taken an active part in relation to all the transactions about the check, and had received $30,000 of the proceeds, of which he had given no account.

Justice Duffy denied the motion to discharge, holding that there was sufficient evidence to put Maxwell on his defense.

Mr. Seward called Mr. Edward King, President of the Union Trust Company, who identified what Mr. Seward called the "alleged" forged check, and testified as follows: The certifications on the check by the Secretary, paying teller, and book-keeper of the trust company are genuine; the check would not have been signed on the 27th of December for the amount it calls for; the balance on deposit in the Union Trust Company on the 29th of December to the credit of the New-York Life Insurance Company was $181,361 85; I first saw the forged check on the 16th of January, in the possession of Mr. Banta; I never saw it while it was in the possession of our company; Messrs. Wm. C. Hays were in the Union Trust Company office on the 16th of January; Maxwell came at the request of Mr. Hays.

Justice Duffy suggested that if the intention was to give what Maxwell said at the Union Trust Company's office, Maxwell himself ought to be called to testify.

Mr. Seward did not accept the suggestion.

Witness resumed: Maxwell came twice to our office; Brown came after Maxwell had been requested to send him there.

William Muir, a broker at No. 115 Broadway, called by Mr. Seward, testified: I know L. A. Brown; I have known him 14 years; he was an Inspector of Arms at Windsor Locks, under the Government, in 1863 and 1864; Brown asked me whether I could handle a check for $100,000, to purchase gold or securities for an institution; he said that the order would come to me from the institution, accompanied by a genuine check, and that the proceeds of the check could be held to see whether it would be pronounced a forgery, but that in that case probably those connected with the institution would have the matter settled in some form; I replied, "I think there are too many holes in that scheme," and I declined to have anything to do with the business.

The hearing is to be resumed at 10:30 o'clock this morning.

A BREACH OF PROMISE SUIT.

A YOUNG WOMAN OF 27 ASSENTS TO MARRIAGE WITH A MAN OVER 50—SHE GETS $1,000 DAMAGES FROM A JURY.

A suit for breach of promise of marriage was brought to trial yesterday before Judge Alker and a jury, in Part I. of the Marine Court. The case was entitled Mary Palmer against Arnold Strauss, and was brought for the recovery of $2,000. The plaintiff is a young woman about 27 years old, and the defendant is a married man of over 50. The plaintiff testified that she resides with her mother at No. 27 Stanton street; her mother advertises herself as a clairvoyant; in March, 1870, the defendant called on her mother to make some inquiries as to the loss in his business; he made a second call about a week later, and afterward called again; he asked her mother whether she had any objections to his visiting the family; her mother said she had none; the family then consisted of the plaintiff, her mother, and her sister, Susanna Palmer, calling two or three times a week; On one of his visits he made a declaration of love thus: "Mary, I love you. I love you better than any woman I ever met since my wife died. Will you have me?" To this she had answered "I am willing." He asked her mother's consent and obtained it. He used to visit her, and he gave her money in sums of $5 and $10 with which to buy clothes. He also gave her a ring inscribed "A. S. to M. P., 1871;" a day was fixed for the marriage in June, 1871; when the time came he asked a postponement on account of family troubles; he said that "a slow fire burns the best;" he represented himself as a widower with grown-up children; he continued to visit her for a year or two regularly; then his visits became less frequent; he excused himself because his business was going wrong; in 1874 the visits ceased altogether; he used to walk out with her in the evening, principally on the east side of the City.

The defendant, when called as a witness, said he had called on the plaintiff's mother to make inquiries about a business matter. He called at the house some 10 or 12 times afterward. He took an interest in the clairvoyant's daughter, and lent her about $100 in small sums. He never expected to get the money back. He denied making the promise, and said he never gave the ring. She came to his house on one occasion, just after her sister's death, to get some money toward the payment of the funeral expenses. She was then introduced to his wife and family. She once asked him to elope with her to California, but he declined. The summing up on the part of defendant's counsel was exceedingly funny. The lawyer is very fat, and spoke English with a strong German accent, and made queer faces at the jury. He admitted that his client had been foolish, but said: "Yes, gentlemen, morally he is wrong, but legally he is right, and gentlemen, you are not going to punish a man for a little something out of the way morally! But, I can assure you, gentlemen of the jury, he will never do so again." The counsel grew facetious in speaking of the fortune teller, and in speaking of a witness whom he called indifferently Mrs. Shobo, Mrs. Shoebo, and Mrs. Shoodoe, and who was supposed to have heard the defendant propose to himself, according to the counsel, as a "widder." Judge Alker charged that, if the jury believed that the defendant made the promise, concealing the fact of his marriage, he was liable, though he would not be if the plaintiff knew of his being a married man. The jury gave the plaintiff a verdict for $1,000.

A programme so excellent promises an enjoyable evening's entertainment.

His furniture was placed on the sidewalk, and he left his little daughter Agnes, aged 9 years, in charge of the chattels while he went in search of other lodgings, and when he returned the child had disappeared, and he has not seen her since. He reported the case to the Police yesterday.

FUNERAL OF MR. J. FRANK BARTLETT.

The funeral of the late J. Frank Bartlett took place at the Church of the Transfiguration, in East Twenty-ninth street, yesterday afternoon. The little church was crowded with the friends of the deceased, among whom were delegations of little children from the primary schools in which Mr. Bartlett had been a music teacher. At the head of the coffin on the steps of the altar was a large number of floral pieces, presented by Primary Schools Nos. 13 and 26 and personal friends of the deceased. The casket inclosing the remains was of rosewood, with silver mountings, and upon the lid was a plate bearing the name and dates of the birth and death of Mr. Bartlett, and two sprigs of acacia crossed and tied with a white ribbon. The services were conducted by Rev. Dr. Houghton. The music rendered included the hymn entitled, "There is a land of pure delight," by the choir; a soprano solo, "Angels ever bright and fair," by Mrs. Martinez, of the choir of St. Joseph's Church, and "I heard a voice from heaven," sung as a tenor solo, by Mr. Charles Fritsch. The pall-bearers were Col. William E. Hoy, Messrs. Harvey Carr, P. H. Charlock, E. Coolidge, and D. Post. At the conclusion of the services at the church, the body was removed to the undertaker's, No. 236 Fourth avenue, where the friends of the deceased were permitted to take a final view of his features, after which the body was removed to East Marshall, Mass., where Mr. Bartlett's mother resides. The interment will take place at Plymouth, Mass.

THE MURDER OF MARY FLOOD.

Coroner Ellinger impaneled a jury yesterday in the case of Mary Flood, the woman who was murdered by her husband, James Flood, in Crosby street on Sunday morning. The inquest was postponed indefinitely in order to afford the Police an opportunity to capture the murderer, of whose present whereabouts the detectives have as yet no well-founded clue. The autopsy on the body, made by Dr. Lowell Goldschmidt, showed that the murderer inflicted two stab wounds, one in the right side of the chest, in the second intercostal space, one inch long and one inch and a half from the median line, passing obliquely downward and merely injuring the muscles of the chest; the other, a penetrating abdominal wound in the median line, injuring the peritoneum, the mesentery, and small intestines. Death, in the opinion of Dr. Goldschmidt, was due to shock and hemorrhage resulting from the wounds above described. William Aifke, the proprietor of the grocery store No. 55 Crosby street, in the rear room of which the woman spent Saturday night in the companionship of Aifke, informed the Coroner that when Mrs. Flood ran into the street the man Joseph Morrison cried out to Flood, "There she goes; now give it to her." This brief statement will probably lead to the arrest of Morrison as an accomplice. He is now in the House of Detention as a witness.

LENHEIM'S TRIALS ACCUMULATING.

ALLEGATIONS OF FORGERIES AMOUNTING TO OVER $100,000—APPLICATION FOR HIS DETENTION FOR EXTRADITION TO PENNSYLVANIA.

Nathan L. Lenheim, the Cashier of the First National Bank of Montrose, Pennsylvania, who is confined in the Tombs in default of $5,000 bail to await trial on the charge of presenting a forged promissory note for $10,000 to the Importers' and Traders' Bank of this City, was charged, at the Tombs Police Court yesterday, with negotiating a similar note for $8,500 at the First National Bank of this City. An application was made to have him detained for extradition to Pennsylvania, to be tried there for forging $90,000 in promissory notes and other paper negotiated by him at the First National Bank of Montrose, by taking advantage of his official position in that institution. He was brought up from his cell in the Tombs and arraigned before Justice Duffy, and seemed appalled at the grave charges made against him. He is a fine-looking young man, and is said to be very respectably connected. Counsel for the First National Bank of Montrose has been very anxious to prevent Lenheim from being released on the bail, saying that, if he was, he would undoubtedly also and to prevent prosecution for the graver forgeries which have just come to light. The $8,500 note, which was negotiated by Lenheim, was indorsed "William H. Cooper" and "N. L. Lenheim" and was stamped on the back "Pay George F. Baker, Cashier, or order. N. L. Lenheim, Cashier." Mr. Lathrop made an affidavit that the note was a forgery; that the signature was a good imitation of his; that he was in the habit of giving to the First National Bank of Montrose notes signed by himself; that Lenheim was Cashier of that bank; that he believed the handwriting in the body of the note was Lenheim's, and that Lenheim uttered the note with intent to defraud. Justice Duffy fixed bail at $10,000, and Lenheim waived an examination and was committed in default of bail. David D. Searles, of Montrose, Penn., applied for Lenheim's detention to await a requisition from the Governor of Pennsylvania for the forgeries in Montrose, alleging that Lenheim was a fugitive from the State. Mr. Searles made an affidavit that he is the Vice President of the First National Bank of Montrose, and is well acquainted with the signature and handwriting of Lenheim; that the writing in the body of the forged note for $8,500 is Lenheim's; that the indorsement of Cooper's name is a forgery, and that the name of Lenheim on the back of the note is in Lenheim's handwriting. Lenheim's bail to await requisition was fixed at $5,000, which he did not offer to furnish. On being asked the usual questions, he responded that he was 25 years old; was born in Great Bend, Penn.; resided at Montrose; was a bank cashier, and was not guilty of the offenses charged.

THE ELECTORAL COMMISSION.

THE UTMOST SECRCEY MAINTAINED WITH REGARD TO THE PROCEEDINGS IN THE PRIVATE SESSION—RUMORS OF WHAT WAS SAID AND DONE—A VOTE TO BE TAKEN TO-DAY ON THE FLORIDA CASE AT 3 P. M.

special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 6.—The Electoral Commission met to-day at 12 o'clock, and was in private consultation, with the exception of ot a brief recess, till about 9 o'clock this evening. The hotel lobbies and newspaper offices were filled with crowds of people waiting to hear the expected decision, but they were disappointed to learn, as they soon did by common rumor, that no decision had been reached. The Commission debated the question upon which it has first to decide till the late hour mentioned, and, without action, adjourned till 10 o'clock to-morrow morning, with an agreement that the vote shall be taken at 3 o'clock in the afternoon. The consultations of the Commission are strictly private, no person being allowed to be present. The debates not being taken by a short-hand writer, the views and arguments of the Commissioners will be lost to posterity. Strict secrecy as to the proceedings in private consultations has been agreed upon, and will no doubt be observed with as much care as is done by the Supreme Court in the case of its private meetings to decide questions brought before it. There are a hundred rumors as to what was said and done, all of which must be regarded as doubtful or baseless, and yet some of them are doubtless true. One statement is that the point of most of the argument to-day was what effect should be given to the judgment of the Florida court in the quo warranto case against the Hayes Electors. Very probably this question would be considerably discussed, as the Democrats on the Commission, as well as the Democrats off it, see the importance of this feature of the case to them. The decision of the Commission will, doubtless, take the form of a rule which will involve the question of going behind the returns, but will not decide it directly in that form. As to the prospects, it is quite certain that leading Democrats are very much depressed. This is so much the fact that several of them have said to-day, privately, that their only hope was in the technicalities respecting Oregon. Republicans are more confident than heretotore, but there is some reason to expect that the Commission will find a middle ground on the subject of admitting evidence, which will not satisfy either party, and which will leave the Florida case practically open till the direct question of which certificate shall be counted is voted upon.

Dispatch to the Associated Press.

The Electoral Commission, after taking a recess of half an hour in the middle of the afternoon, remained in secret session until nearly 8 o'clock this evening, when they adjourned to meet again for private conference at 10 o'clock to-morrow morning. No votes were taken to-day, nor was any conclusion reached on any point at issue; but it was agreed all pending questions in regard to the admission of evidence shall be decided to-morrow. It can be stated that, according to present indications, a majority of the Commission will decide that, in addition to the Electoral certificates, no evidence can be received by the Commission in regard to the Florida case except such as relates merely to the action of the Florida State Government subsequent to the Presidential election. Conceding this to be the determination of the Commission, their inquiries in regard to matters of fact will be restricted to a comparatively narrow range, and thus a final decision in the Florida case may be expected sooner than has been generally anticipated. The evidence concerning the action of the Florida courts and Legislature on the matter in controversy is of a documentary character and is already accessible to the Commission. It is probable therefore that their final decision in the Florida case will be reported to the joint session of the two houses before the close of the present week.

TILDEN'S AGENTS IN CORRUPTION.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 8.—The George L. Miller who has figured so conspicuously in the Oregon telegraph dispatches has been captured. He came from Omaha here, and stopping at a hotel without registering his name, opened communication with the Democracy. A Deputy Sergeant at Arms of the Senate to-day came down upon him with a subpœna, and he will have to tell what he knows about Oregon. He was surprised at his capture and, expressed astonishment in a very emphatic manner. Patrick has probably escaped.

HEALTH OF SECRETARY MORRILL.

SYMPTOMS OF TYPHOID PNEUMONIA—HIS CONDITION NOT DANGEROUS, BUT A SOURCE OF ANXIETY TO HIS FRIENDS.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 6.—Secretary Morrill has been confined to his bed for a week with pneumonia. At first the disease was not regarded as dangerous, but latterly symptoms of a typhoid character have been developed, and he is now said to have what is known popularly as typhoid pneumonia. He suffers much, and his strength is considerably exhausted. He is not pronounced to be in a dangerous condition, but his friends have great anxiety, for which there is good reason.

NOTES FROM THE CAPITAL.

EMBARRASSMENTS OF THE HOUSE AND SENATE—THE ELECTORAL COUNT ACT—EARLY RISING NOT THE STRONG POINT OF SENATORS.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 6.—Among the many inconveniences which have been brought upon Congress by the passage of the Electoral Count bill, is the meeting of the two houses at the unusually early hour of 10 o'clock. This morning at the time named, only three Senators, Messrs. Burnside, Paddock, and Windom, were present in the Senate Chamber, and it was of course necessary to take a recess. At 12 o'clock the regular session was commenced, and Mr. Conkling opened the routine business of the day by presenting a petition from Elizabeth Cady Stanton and other ladies, praying that the right of suffrage be extended to women. Shortly afterward the bill to provide for the repayment of the money advanced by the Government to the Pacific railroads was taken up and considered at length.

In the House, only seven members were present at 10 o'clock, and a recess was taken until noon, when the business of the day was proceeded with.

The House Judiciary Committee this morning agreed to report that in their opinion the difficulty in regard to an adjournment of the House before the completion of the Electoral count can be obviated by a change in the rules, as suggested by Speaker Randall yesterday, and that, therefore, an amendment of the Electoral act will not be necessary. Mr. Knott subsequently presented the report, but immediately withdrew it upon a private suggestion that it would be better to await a report which will probably be made by the Committee on Rules to-day, in accordance with its conclusions.

The German Minister says it is not true, as has been published, that all German Honorary Consuls are to be withdrawn from the United States. He says that only the inland Honorary Consulates will be abolished, and that they will be replaced by two or three Consuls, namely, at St. Louis, Chicago, and probably Cincinnati, and that all the German Honorary Consulates in the harbors of the United States will remain.

At the Cabinet meeting to-day all the members were present excepting Secretary Robeson and Secretary Morrill. The business was wholly routine.

In 1841 the original Declaration of Independence and certain treaties were sent by Daniel Webster, who was Secretary of State, to the Patent Office for safe-keeping, and deposited in a proper place in that building. Now that there is ample security for these documents in the State Department building, in the custody of which department they are thought to properly belong, Mr. Chandler has considered it his duty to restore them to that department, and an order to that effect has been issued.

In the Criminal Court to-day, Earl S. Rathburn, the Post Office clerk who, a few weeks since was arrested for abstracting letters, pleaded guilty, and was sentenced to two years in the Penitentiary.

The Senate, in executive session to-day, confirmed the following nominations: James Sheppard as Collector of Customs at St. Mary's, Ga.; Isaac Clements as Pension Agent at Salem, Ill.; Postmasters—J. W. Card at Mason City, Iowa; Miss Ida House at Alledo, Ill.; S. T. Cheever at Delevan, Ill.; M. M. Camp at Navasota, Texas. The Senate also confirmed a number of transfers of Army officers from one regiment to another without change of rank.

The Indian Appropriation bill, as reported from the Senate Committee to-day, is increased in amount $636,000 over the total sanctioned by the House, which was $4,432,000. The principal items of increase proposed by the Senate Committee are as follows: $297,000 for Sioux Indians of various tribes; $25,000 for the Sioux at Fort Peck Agency; $43,000 for the Osages, and $15,000 for the support of schools.

The Silver Commission, of which Senator Jones, of Nevada, is Chairman, held a session to-day at which Mr. Henri Cernuchi, the eminent French writer on financial subjects, gave an extended expression of his views concerning the relative values of gold and silver and the advisability of establishing the bi-metallic standard. The receipts from internal revenue to-day were $202,067 32, and from Customs, $269,184 09.

The following is a statement of balances in the United States Treasury to-day at the hour of closing: Currency, $10,546,134; special deposit of legal tenders for redemption of certificates of deposit, $34,855,000; coin, (including $55,000,200 in coin certificates,) $89,170,192; outstanding legal tenders, $364,894,812.

Advices to the Internal Revenue Office show that preparations are nearly consummated for a raid upon illicit distillers in the Northern portions of Georgia and South Carolina. The raid will be conducted by mounted infantry, no cavalry being obtainable. Commissioner Raum has purchased 53 horses and cavalry equipments to be used by the infantry force.

Five companies of United States troops arrived here yesterday; one company, numbering 56 men, under command of Col. Frank, and which has been stationed for some time at Charleston, S. C., disembarked and marched to the arsenal, where they will be quartered. The other companies proceeded to New-York. Two companies of the Second Artillery are expected to arrive in a day or two, and will also be quartered at the arsenal.

The Senate Committee on Public Lands heard Senators Clayton and Dorsey, and Representative Gause, of Arkansas, and a number of the parties interested in the subject of the proper disposition of the Hot Springs Government reservation. It was finally agreed by all present, that the enactment of the House bill will be, with certain amendments, an acceptable settlement of the various pending controversies, and the Committee will accordingly report the bill with these amendments, which are of a comparatively unimportant character and do not materially affect the main provisions of the bill.

THE FINANCES OF THE NATION.

JUDGE KELLY OPPOSED TO THE PRESIDENT'S VIEWS ON THE SPECIE QUESTION—THE TRADE OF 1876—A BALANCE IN FAVOR OF THE UNITED STATES OF NEARLY $200,000,000—DECREASE OF CUSTOMS RECEIPTS AND INCREASE OF INTERNAL REVENUE RECEIPTS.

From Our Own Correspondent.

WASHINGTON, Monday, Feb. 5, 1877.

The recommendations of the President in favor of an early resumption of specie payment will meet with sturdy opposition from Judge Kelley and those who have been clamoring for the repeal of the act providing for resumption on Jan. 1, 1879. Judge Kelley has already expressed his opposition to the views of the President on this subject, in an interview published within a few days, and draws a picture of our financial future in the gloomy colors he handles so deftly when working up national finances. He sees no encouragement whatever in the fact that during the last calendar year, after paying the world for all the merchandise we purchased, there was a balance of nearly $200,000,000 in our favor. The facts and figures, however, which furnish no encouragement to Judge Kelley and his school of financiers, will be regarded with peculiar interest at this time by those who have no wild theories to dim their vision, and who have the hard sense to appreciate the difference between the debit and the credit sides of the ledger. To the ordinary mind, the single fact that the value of legal tenders of the Government has risen to within 5 per cent. of the gold standard indicates that our national credit is steadily advancing, and that the causes which have compelled the Government to continue the expedient of a paper currency have so nearly disappeared that it is a question for statesmen and business men to consider whether it would not be politic and wise to make the short bound which will bring us at once to the use and maintenance of a stable metallic currency.

An examination of our export and import trade will be valuable in connection with a consideration of this subject. During the calendar year 1876, the specie valuation of our exports of merchandise, exclusive of coin and bullion, was $590,621,783, and the value of merchandise imported from foreign countries for the same period was $426,612,706. As compared with the calendar year 1875, these figures show an increase in the value of exports in favor of 1876 of $79,673,361, and a decrease in the value of imports of $76,540,230. These figures represent the aggregate value of the merchandise exchanged between the people of the United States and those of other nations, no credit being made on either side for cash paid on account. The commercial transactions of the last year, stated in a manner which will be readily understood by all business men, make the following exhibit: During the year 1876 we sold the people of other countries merchandise of our own growth and manufacture to the gold value of $575,698,040, and foreign merchandise to the value of $14,923,743, making the aggregate sales for the year foot up $590,620,783. There was remitted to the United States in the same time, on account of these sales, coin and bullion to the value of $34,479,397, thus leaving the world our debtors to the amount of $556,141,386. Against this we bought from the people of other countries merchandise to the value of $426,612,706, and paid in coin and bullion, on account of those transactions, $56,354,465, leaving a balance against us on our purchases of $370,258,241. When, therefore, we come to balance and settle accounts for the year, the bills of exchange in favor of the United States aggregate $185,883,145, that being the balance in favor of the United States on the transactions for the calendar year 1876. Stated in another way the account stands as follows:

Exports of merchandise	$590,620,783
Exports of coin and bullion	56,354,465
Total exports	$646,975,248
Imports of merchandise	426,612,706
Imports of coin and bullion	34,479,397
Total imports	$461,092,103
Value exports over imports	185,883,145

These figures are encouraging to business men, and should be suggestive to statesmen. They do not represent a business due to any extraordinary emergency or transitory cause, as a close inspection of the detailed report of the import and export statistics for the past few years will show. While our principal manufacturing industries have been for two or three years comparatively at a stand, the development of our great natural resources has been pushed forward, and the products in excess of what was required for home consumption have found a ready market. The material development of natural resources, which has gone forward with a fair degree of progress, is a greater element of national wealth than any mere money balance of trade, however great, can be, and will more than compensate for the economic value lost to the country by the decreased immigration of the past few years, and some other factors which Judge Kelley uses in making up the gloomy background of his financial tableau. Besides, the detailed report of the Bureau of Statistics shows that new industries have been developed during the past few years, and that on the list of domestic exports are now found articles of American manufacture previously unknown to foreign commerce. Everything indicates that the improvement in our trade and commerce, as exhibited by the figures herein given, is permanent, and no reasonable cause can be assigned why this improvement should not be maintained and go steadily forward.

A comparison of the transactions of 1876 with those of 1875 will show that the improvement in the condition of our export trade is steadily increasing. During 1875 the gold value of our exported merchandise was $510,947,422 and our imports $503,152,936. In the same period we exported in coin and bullion $79,258,514 and received $22,896,148, leaving a balance of $64,000,000 due the United States at the end of that year. Pursuing the comparison further, it will be found that during the six months, ended Dec. 31, 1876, the net excess of exports (gold value) over imports was $108,000,000, or nearly twice the amount of the excess for the entire calendar year, 1875. A revival of our manufacturing industries would, of course, cause a marked increase in our imports, but with a margin of nearly $200,000,000 in our favor, and the natural impetus which a revival of business would give our export trade, there need be no apprehension that specie will not stay in circulation should some such legislation be adopted as that which is favored by the President.

The Treasury, notwithstanding the large decline in Customs receipts consequent upon the falling off of imports, is in a fair condition to encourage early resumption. For the seven months just ended the public debt was decreased $8,587,773, which is within $2,000,000 of the amount reduced for the corresponding seven months of the preceding fiscal year, when we had $12,000,000 more from Customs receipts than we have had for the past seven months. The January debt statement shows a large coin balance in the Treasury, notwithstanding the large amount paid out for January interest. The aggregate coin balance is $86,477,680, of which $53,313,700 are coin certificates and $1,407,606 silver subsidiary coins, thus leaving the gold balance owned by the Government, $31,756,174. The interest actually due in coin, and unpaid on Feb. 1, aggregates $9,588,530, and including the coin interest accrued to Feb. 1, this liability foots up $16,536,470. Thus, deducting every obligation of the Government, the gold balance on Feb. 1, exclusive of silver, was $15,219,704. For the purposes of resumption, however, the greater portion of the $50,000,000 can be relied upon, as the various claims against the aggregate coin balance are not likely to be presented for payment at the same time. The currency balance on Feb. 1 was $9,496,266.

The legal-tenders outstanding show a decrease of $1,070,272 for January, and fractional currency a decrease of $923,639. The withdrawal of fractional currency is more than compensated for by the issue of subsidiary silver coins. The total amount of subsidiary silver coins issued to Feb. 1 is $27,396,855. The amount of fractional currency reported as outstanding is $25,424,567, but it is believed that not more than half of that amount will be presented for redemption. The amount outstanding of the first three issues is said to be $10,463,720 50. Little more than $1,100 of those three issues were presented last month, and this was distributed as follows: Of the first issue, $2 98 were redeemed; second, $1 42; third, $1,132 48. These figures indicate that very little of the first three series remains to be redeemed.

The Customs receipts for January were $10,266,687, a decline of about $500,000 as compared with January, 1876. The Internal Revenue receipts for the month were $10,009,531, an increase of about $500,000 as compared with January, 1876. Compared with the seven months ended January, 1876, the last seven months of the current fiscal year show an aggregate falling off in Customs receipts of over $12,000,000. The Internal Revenue receipts for the seven months just closed are about $900.000,000 in excess of the receipts from that source for the corresponding seven months of the preceding fiscal year. The net ordinary expenditures of the Government for the last seven months were $94,302,861, which is about $13,000,000 less than the amount expended for the corresponding months of the preceding year. The above statement of disbursements does not include interest on the public debt.

The amount of national bank notes now outstanding is $305,000,000 and legal tenders $365,000,000. The Treasurer now holds in legal tenders, to redeem the circulating notes of insolvent and liquidating national banks, $17,686,668.

THE MISSISSIPPI JETTIES BILL.

ADVERSE REPORT OF THE SENATE COMMITTEE ON APPROPRIATIONS—CAPT. EADS HELD TO BE ENTITLED TO BONDS AT PAR INSTEAD OF THE MONEY FROM THE TREASURY.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 6.—The Senate Appropriation Committee to-day reported adversely on the House bill proposing an appropriation of $500,000 to pay the requisition of the Secretary of War in favor of James B. Eads, on account of the improvement of the bar at the South Pass of the Mississippi River. Senator Windom, on behalf of the committee, submitted a written report on the subject, stating that after a careful examination of law and facts, the committee find that said Eads, having fulfilled the required condition of the contract on his part and secured the specified width and depth of channel, received the requisition or warrant of the Secretary of War for $500,000 on the 19th of January, 1877. That no appropriation having been "previously provided," Mr. Eads, on the 20th of January, 1877, demanded the payment of the said requisition, in bonds. The committee is clearly of the opinion that Mr. Eads is entitled, under the law, to receive at once the bonds therein described at par in payment of the said requisition of the Secretary of War in his favor, Congress having failed to "previously provide for the payment of the same by the necessary appropriations of money." The committee believe that the act approved March 3, 1875, was intended to and does fully provide for the prompt payment of the sums of money therein stated as they shall respectively become due, and that the option of the Government to pay the same in money or bonds in time to meet the warrant drawn by the Secretary of War must be exercised by Congress. In the present case Congress had timely notice from the Secretary of War in his annual report dated Nov. 20, 1876, of the "probable time when the payment would become due." The committee therefore recommend that appropriations to meet the payments which will probably become due during the present and ensuing fiscal year be made during the present session of Congress, and that as the law fully entitles Mr. Eads to receive the payment now due in bonds, it is recommended that the House bill appropriating $500,000 to pay the requisition of the Secretary of War in favor of James B. Eads be indefinitely postponed.

RAILROAD COLLISION IN INDIANA.

EVANSVILLE, Feb. 6.—A collision last night, between a freight and a coal train, on the St. Louis and South-eastern Railroad, caused the instant death of Frank Wilson, a brakeman, and severe injuries to A. Brookman, engineer, and several brakemen.

THE EASTERN SITUATION.

THE FALL OF MIDHAT PASHA.

REASONS FOR HIS DISMISSAL—A PLOT DISCOVERED FOR THE OVERTHROW OF THE SULTAN—THE EX-GRAND VIZIER SENT TO BRINDISI—RUMORS OF A CONCILIATORY SPIRIT ON THE PART OF THE PORTE—MIDHAT'S DISRESPECTFUL CONDUCT TOWARD THE SULTAN.

LONDON, Feb. 6.—No reasons for Midhat Pasha's fall from the Grand Vizierate have yet reached London except the following statement, contained in a special dispatch from Constantinople to the Daily News: "Midhat Pasha has long been opposing the Sultan, who desired to yield and make concessions to the conference. His removal is in every way desirable. Edhem Pasha's appointment will be conducive to conciliation." The foregoing is wholly at variance with all previous accounts of Edhem Pasha's opinions and conduct.

A dispatch to Reuter's Telegram Company from Constantinople says: "The Sultan issued a decree yesterday appointing Edhem Pasha Grand Vizier, and making other changes in the Ministry. He then sent an aide de camp to notify Midhat Pasha of his dismissal and to request him to repair to the palace. Thence he was immediately conveyed on board the imperial yacht, which sailed for the Mediterranean, with orders to land him beyond Turkish territory."

A Reuter telegram from Constantinople, says the dismissal of Midhat Pasha is attributed to his schemes of constitutional reform, which are represented to have been regarded by the Sultan as encroaching on the imperial prerogative. A rumor, however, is current that his removal is due to the discovery of a conspiracy to dethrone the Sultan and replace him by ex-Sultan Murad.

The Porte, in notifying its representatives abroad of the Ministerial changes, adds: "The Sultan urgently recommends the Grand Vizier to speedily and completely develop all the principles established by the Constitution, and to carry out all laws and administrative institutions applicable to the provinces."

The Pall Mall Gazette this afternoon says it does not believe Midhat Pasha's downfall betokens a more conciliatory policy, but rather believes that Edhem Pasha's accession means more uncompromising resistance. What seems to the Pall Mall Gazette the most likely explanation of the change is that the Sultan had become jealous of Midhat Pasha's influence, and chafed under the impotence of the position to which the energetic Grand Vizier had reduced him, and lent himself to intrigues from the success of which he might hope to recover some of the lost imperial authority. So that Edhem Pasha's accession may be purely an affair of men, not measures, and need not foreshadow any change in political prospects.

A special dispatch from Constantinople to the Pall Mall Gazette says: "The cause of Midhat Pasha's fall dates back some time. The imperious character of Midhat Pasha clashed with the firmness of the Sultan, whose liberal views went far ahead of Midhat's. The Constitution disappointed the Sultan by the multiplicity of its reserves and qualifications, and many warm discussions occurred between the Sovereign and Minister. The Sultan desired to introduce largely a foreign element into Turkish administration, and especially to employ Englishmen in leading positions in all departments. His Majesty expressed this desire to Midhat Pasha very strongly on several occasions, and last week took him sternly to task for not having acted upon it. Midhat Pasha replied curtly, and wrote subsequently to the Sultan in undeferential terms. On Friday last the Sultan sent for Midhat Pasha, but the summons was not obeyed. On Saturday Midhat Pasha remained home on a plea of indisposition. On Sunday a third summons was disobeyed, but Midhat Pasha attended a Ministerial Council in the afternoon. Meanwhile the Police discovered secret correspondence which showed that Midhat Pasha was plotting the overthrow of the Sultan and his own nomination as Dictator. On Monday a peremptory summons brought Midhat Pasha to the Palace, suspecting nothing. On entering he was arrested and his letters laid before him. There was no gainsaying the evidence against him, and he asked for mercy. A Council of Ministers was called and Midhat Pasha was offered the choice of leaving the country or being arraigned before a tribunal on a charge of high treason. He elected to leave the country and was asked if he would go to Greece. He replied that he did not like the Greeks and asked to go to Brindisi, but complained that he had no ready money. Twenty-five hundred dollars was given him, and he embarked at noon for Brindisi on board the imperial yacht Izzedin. The letters found disclosed that 3,000 Ulemas were to have gone on Monday night to the palace to demand the abdication of the Sultan. The fall of Midhat Pasha will check no reforms, the Sultan being determined to carry out the Constitution in its fullest spirit.

LONDON, Feb. 7.—Telegrams continue to be very conflicting as to the probable effect of the crisis in Turkey's foreign relations. The Standard's Berlin dispatch says the change is considered to be preliminary to reopening relations with Russia and the signatory powers.

A dispatch from Constantinople to the Standard reports that the British man-of-war Bittern, which was about to quit Constantinople, has been detained by order of the English Chargé d'Affaires for protection of the foreign residents.

The Berlin correspondent of the Times says Midhat Pasha's fall was occasioned by his refusal to conclude peace with Servia unless Turkey received guarantees. As resumption of hostilities was probable in consequence of this resolute policy the old Court party induced the Sultan to supersede Midhat. Unless the Sultan changes his mind Edhem Pasha's Administration will only pave the way for a Cabinet with a decidedly pacific concession programme.

The Times dispatch from Belgrade says the peace party there interpret Midhat's dismissal as an indication that the Porte will finally accede to the wishes of the late conference. Others give it an exactly a contrary interpretation. It is now said M. Ristics instead of Magazinovitch is preparing to go to Constantinople to reopen negotiations. The correspondent calls attention to the significance of an article in the Istok, the Servian official journal. The article disputes the assertion of the Golos that Russia did everything possible to restrain Servia from war, and declares, but for Russia's designs on Constantinople the Servian nation would now be free and united. The millions of roubles and thousands of volunteers sent to Servia have united her to Russia. If Russia acts against the Turks it would be of the greatest importance that Servia and Montenegro should co-operate with her and occupy Bosnia and Herzegovina. If Russia advances, she may be certain that Servia will go with her, because with Russian support Servia could yet accomplish much.

This declaration is the more noticeable as the Servian press is subject to strict censorship. The article is regarded in Belgrade as an attempt to arouse the sympathy of Russia and excite the apprehensions of the Turks, so as to induce them to grant more liberal terms. It may accomplish the former, but hardly the latter purpose.

Belgrade is thronged with volunteers, and officers are busy organizing and equipping them for Gladova. Despite Servia's exhaustion, a few thousand pounds from Russia would enable the War Department to turn out a corps of 20,000 picked men.

The Paris correspondent of the Standard telegraphs that he is informed that the Russian Army has received orders to advance, and will cross the Pruth within a few days.

THE NEGOTIATIONS WITH SERVIA.

NEW CONDITIONS PROPOSED BY TURKEY—GUARANTEES WAIVED.

VIENNA, Feb. 6.—The Politische Correspondenz states that the Porte has proposed the following conditions to Servia, waiving its former claim for substantial guarantees: First—The right of being diplomatically represented at Belgrade. Second—That Catholics and Jews shall enjoy the same rights as native Servians. Third—That Servia shall not allow the formation of armed bands, or the violation of Turkish territory. Fourth—That the existence of secret Societies shall not be permitted. Fifth—That the Servian fortresses shall be kept in good repair; and, finally, that the Turkish flag shall be hoisted upon those fortresses jointly with the Servian flag. The Politische Correspondenz says: "Servia will doubtless accept these conditions and send a special Commissioner to Constantinople."

Werten Effendi, special envoy from the Porte to Prince Milan, has arrived at Semlin. The authorities of Belgrade have given orders for his reception. His arrival will delay, if not altogether render unnecessary, the sending of a deputation to Constantinople, as has been proposed.

A telegram from Kisheneff to the Daily News states that the Grand Duke Nicholas went to Odessa on Tuesday. He has quite recovered from his illness, but requires change of air. The weather at Kisheneff has been cold, dry, and favorable to health for several weeks.

THE RUSSIAN CIRCULAR NOTE.

THE TEXT OF THE CONCLUDING PORTION—THE OTTOMAN EMPIRE A PERMANENT MENACE TO THE PEACE OF EUROPE—THE TURKISH REFUSAL AN ASSAULT ON THE DIGNITY OF THE POWERS—INFORMATION REQUESTED REGARDING ANY PROPOSED ACTION.

LONDON, Feb. 6.—The text of Prince Gortchakoff's circular note, addressed to the Russian representatives at the courts of the other guaranteeing powers, under date of Jan. 31, has been received here. After recapitulating, as heretofore telegraphed to the United States, the diplomatic efforts at pacification extending from the outbreak of the insurrection in 1875 to the convening of the Constantinople Conference, the note continues:

This conference, in its preliminary deliberations, arrived at a complete understanding, both respecting the conditions of peace and the reforms to be introduced. It communicated the result to the Porte as the firm and unanimous wish of Europe, but met with an obstinate refusal. Thus, after more than a year of diplomatic efforts, demonstrating the value the great powers attach to the pacification of the East, and the right they possess of insuring it, because of the general interests involved, and their firm desire to obtain it by means of a European understanding, the Cabinets again find themselves in the same position as at the commencement of the crisis, which has been further aggravated by the blood that has been shed, the passions that have been raised, and the indefinite prolongation of the deplorable state of things which weighs upon Europe, and justly preoccupies public opinion and the Governments.

The Porte pays no regard to its former engagements, to its duties as a member of the European concert, or to the unanimous wishes of the great powers. Far from having made a step toward a satisfactory solution of the Eastern question, the Ottoman Empire has been and remains a permanent menace to the peace of Europe, as well as to the sentiments of humanity and the consciences of Christian peoples. Under these circumstances, before deciding on a course he may think right to follow, his Majesty, the Emperor, wishes to know what course will be determined upon by the Cabinets with whom we have acted up to the present, and with whom we desire, as far as possible, to continue proceeding in common accord. The object which the great powers have in view has been clearly defined by the acts of the conference. The refusal of the Turkish Government touches the dignity and peace of Europe. It is important for us to know what the Cabinets, with which we have acted in concert until now, intend to do in reply to this refusal, and for insuring the execution of their wishes. You are requested to ask for information on this point, and to read and give a copy of this dispatch to the Minister of Foreign Affairs. GORTSCHAKOFF.

LONDON, Feb. 7.—The Times in its leading editorial, commenting on the full text of the Russian circular, says there is no suggestion of anything which can properly be called a threat. The circular does not seem to seek a pretext for backing out.

MISCELLANEOUS FOREIGN NOTES.

MANCHESTER, Feb. 6.—At the annual meeting of the Chamber of Commerce yesterday the President stated that the exports of Manchester goods to the United States, which formerly afforded an excellent market, were now nil, and that there is considerable trade in Manchester in cotton fabrics manufactured in America.

VERSAILLES, Feb. 6.—In the Chamber of Deputies yesterday M. Ordinaire, (Radical Republican,) member for Lyons, questioned the Government as to what steps it intended to take to alleviate the distress among the workmen of Lyons. M. Ordinaire stated that 50,000 operatives were thrown out of employment in consequence of low wages and the dearness of raw silk, which had risen 80 per cent. in price. M. Simon, President of the Council, replied that the Government would do everything in its power to assist the local authorities. It appears, from an article in the Economiste Francaise, that two-thirds of the silk workers are unemployed, and manufacturers declare that works cannot be resumed until the price of raw silk falls 15 per cent. The Prefect of the Rhone has devoted $53,000 from the local funds to the relief of the sufferers. The Economiste Francaise adds that it is believed by many that the business of Lyons will not soon recover, and that the demand for silk fabrics is declining before that for woolens.

LONDON, Feb. 6.—The Court of Exchequer has affirmed the decision of the Huddersfield magistrates, convicting Dr. Monck, the Spiritualist medium, under the Vagrant act, and sentencing him to three months' imprisonment.

BERLIN, Feb. 6.—The prospectus is published of the twelfth series of Russian mortgage credit bonds for 10,000,000 silver roubles. The bonds are to be placed in Amsterdam, Berlin, Frankfort, Brussels, Antwerp, and Russia.

LONDON, Feb. 7.—The ravages of the small-pox are again increasing. There were 103 deaths from the disease in London last week, being the largest number during the present epidemic except in the first week of January.

The Standard's dispatch from Vienna announces that the Hungarian Ministers have tendered their resignations because of failure to effect an agreement with Austria on the bank question. It is doubtful whether the Emperor has accepted their resignations.

THE SUSQUEHANNA ICE GORGE.

SUSPENSE OF THE RESIDENTS OF PORT DEPOSIT—THE IMMENSE WALL OF ICE AS FIRM AS EVER.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

BALTIMORE, Feb. 6.—The suspense of the residents of Port Deposit, instead of abating, is increasing. The immense ice gorge at the town still remains as firm as ever. The vast body of water confined in it is slightly sinking, the supposition being that it is forcing itself under the gorge, but still the immense cakes of ice, 15 inches thick, continue to mass upon each other. Not only in the centre of the stream has risen this impenetrable wall, but it has also formed upon the river sides in front, above, and below Port Deposit. Many had hoped, as the flood had not come upon them last night, that it would pass to-day, but when they see the ice massing hourly their hopes give way to gloomy forebodings. Information has been received from points further up the stream announcing great destruction of property. Marthens' bridge, near Lockhaven, Penn., has not been damaged so far. It is loaded down with freight cars, but if the river should rise suddenly it must go. There are 40 feet of gorged ice at that point. All the farms along the river are covered with water, and the fences have been torn down. At McCall's Ferry the ice has not moved, but instead grows more formidable. The time for high tide is midnight, and that hour is looked for with anxiety, as the ice is more likely to move then than at any other time. The people of the threatened town are prepared for the danger, and boats have been hauled upon the sidewalks and chained to the houses, and the high bluffs in the rear of the town are covered with people gazing on this wonderful panorama. Scores of men are out along the river-front to-night watching for indications of a final break, and the inhabitants will be notified in time to get a place of safety. Business is almost entirely suspended, and the sale of tickets from points on the Philadelphia, Wilmington and Baltimore Railroad has been suspended.

A PEACEFUL GOING OUT OF THE ICE EXPECTED.

Dispatch to the Associated Press.

PORT DEPOSIT, Feb. 6.—The ice gorge abreast of the town remain the same, and the great mass of ice between this place and Havre-de Grace is still unbroken. All accounts from above are favorable to a peaceful going out of the ice. The fears of the people here are being dissipated, and things in the town have assumed their usual activity. North of this point there is very little ice in the river for 14 miles, where at Tites' Eddy there is quite a heavy gorge, but no damage has been done. At McCall's Ferry a very narrow passage of the river 10 miles further up, there is a still heavier gorge, and the water backs up to Safe Harbor, six miles above, but the ice is not near so heavy as it was in 1873, when it reached 60 feet in height, and did great damage to Port Deposit, where it broke. There is great reason to believe that the gorge at McCall's Ferry will hold and let the water through gradually and save this town from another inundation. At Columbia, 40 miles above here, the ice moved for about two hours to-day, which created some excitement there, but it gorged again at York Furnace, and holds firm.

THE ICE UNCHANGED AT HAVRE DE GRACE.

HAVRE DE GRACE, Md., Feb. 6.—The ice remains unchanged at the railroad bridge but is quite rotten. On the west side of the Susquehanna there is a strip of water extending the whole length of the town. From our light-house to the Battery light-house, the ice is broken in large cakes and drifting up and down with the tide. Have nothing reliable from above.

THE CONDITION IN PENNSYLVANIA.

LOCK HAVEN, Penn., Feb. 6.—There has been no change in the river since noon.

HARRISBURG, Feb. 6.—The river is clear of ice at this point, and is about five feet above low water mark.

COLUMBIA, Penn., Feb 6—7 P. M.—The gorge at McCall's Ferry extends five miles back to Shanks' Ferry, and at this hour there are no signs of a break.

KEATING, Penn., Feb 6.—The water here is still falling, and in the absence of heavy rain there is no apprehension of danger.

LEWISBURG, Feb. 6.—The river has risen about 18 inches since 5 o'clock this evening, and the ice has moved slightly.

NORTHUMBERLAND, Feb. 6.—The river is very high here, and full of ice. At Dry Valley Furnace, four miles above here, the ice is firm and still gorged. Below this point the ice moved slightly this afternoon, but is now stationary.

PHILADELPHIA, Feb. 6.—The Delaware River near this city is quite clear of ice. The Schuylkill is still frozen above the city, but no danger is apprehended.

THE "GOBBLE" DISPATCH TO TILDEN

AN INTERPRETATION SUPPLIED BY A WESTERN PAPER.

DETROIT, Feb. 6.—The Tribune of this city will contain to-morrow morning a perfect translation of the famous "Gobble" cipher dispatch sent to Mr. Tilden from Portland, Oregon, Dec. 1. It is as follows:

"I shall decide every point in the case of Post Office Elector in favor of the highest Democratic Elector and grant the certificate accordingly rule morning of sixth in consequence confidential."

The demonstration is absolutely perfect. A copy of a peculiar pocket edition of an English dictionary was used, and the Tribune states that it has good reason to know the particular book was in Portland at that particular time and in whose possession it was. The Tribune took the dictionary and translated the cipher word for word, as above given, according to the key furnished.

A DISHONEST POSTMASTER ARRESTED.

NEW-HAVEN, Feb. 6.—Within a few weeks many letters have been missed between the town of Woodbury and this city and other places. The case was put in the hands of Special Agent Spurling, who caught the robber in the act. He is B. S. Hicock, Postmaster at Southbury—a man hitherto much respected. He was at once arrested, and has made a confession of his guilt. He was bound over to-day for trial in the sum of $2,000.

PRINTERS' STRIKE IN CHICAGO.

CHICAGO, Feb. 6.—The Post of this city, as already announced, reduced its rate of composition yesterday to 30 cents, new men largely taking the cases. This brought on a conflict with the Printers' Union, and to-day about half the new force quit their cases, having been influenced thereto by the Union. This opens a battle which promises to become general, as it is rumored that other papers will also reduce as soon as the Post gets through its contest.

A RAILROAD DECISION IN MAINE.

BANGOR, Feb. 6.—An important decision was rendered to-day by the Supreme Court in favor of the State against the Maine Central Railroad, involving taxes to the amount of $50,000. Exemption was claimed by the road on account of consolidation with another corporation. Several other cases hinge upon this decision.

RUINOUS BANK DEFALCATION.

INDIANAPOLIS, Feb. 6.—The Sentinel of to-morrow will publish a full account of the closing of the First National Bank at Franklin, Johnson County, in this State, caused by defalcations, long concealed, of the Cashier, Richard T. Taylor, who absconded yesterday. The bank loses fully $100,000.

THE LOUISIANA RETURNS.

GOV. WELLS AND FIELD'S COMMITTEE.

SLOW PROGRESS OF DUDLEY FIELD WITH H

the Returning Board, and to prevent any destruction of papers.

THE COMMITTEE DEFIED.

Mr. Field—You have stated that you never altered a return or destroyed a paper? A.—I decline to answer the question. The witness declined to answer any question concerning the action of the board until the House gave him his liberty and relieved him of his disability. He wanted to know whether he was the peer of any member of the committee or a vassal.

Mr. Knott reminded him that the obligation of his oath required him [the witness] to answer every question put to him unless such answer would criminate him.

Mr. Wells said there was no question he might answer which would subject him to prosecution, but he reserved his construction as to what were his rights, and the committee had no right to question him when he was in duress.

Q.—Did you take part in any conspiracy to give the State to Tilden? A.—Are you through?

Mr. Field—Mr. Stenographer, read him the question.

Mr. Wells—Is that the finish of your question?

Mr. Tucker—This is trifling.

Chairman—Oh, Mr. Wells; answer the question or decline to answer.

Mr. Wells—May I say a word?

Chairman—Not now.

Witness—I do not know whether I am a vassal or a peer; if a peer, I should like to know it; if I am a vassal, I am forced as a servant to answer your question.

Chairman—I wish in the kindest spirit to bring to your attention the attitude you occupy.

Witness—There is no gentleman to whom I would listen with more attention than yourself, but I must consider my duty.

The Chairman—I merely wished to remind you that, having sworn to tell the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, you must answer.

The witness—I will, fully, whenever relieved of the disability imposed by the House, which holds me in duress.

Mr. Lawrence asked the witness whether he declined to answer because he feared he might render himself liable to a criminal prosecution.

The witness replied he did not.

Mr. Field—Will you explain what position you occupy?

The witness—Am I a vassal or a peer?

The Chairman—That has nothing to do with your position. You are under an obligation to answer every question, excepting, of course, such as might tend to criminate you.

The Witness—I reserve to myself the construction of my rights, and the Committee have no power to force me to answer questions while I am under sentence of the House.

Mr. Field—You rejected 10,000 votes and upward. Were they rejected for any cause other than alleged intimidation? The Witness—I decline to answer.

Q.—Did you not know the rejection of 10,000 votes was a part of the conspiracy to give the Electoral vote to the party not entitled to it? A.—I leave that for yourself to answer.

Q.—Did you take part in any such conspiracy? A.—Does that conclude your question?

Chairman—Oh, answer the question or not.

Mr. Tucker—We will take the vote to see if such conduct on the part of the witness should be tolerated in the committee.

Chairman—The question is whether the committee will require the witness to answer.

Mr. Tucker—The sentence of reprobation should be put on the witness for not answering.

Witness—Then I am a vassal.

The Chairman—Keep order, Sir.

Mr. Seelye remarked it was unanimously decided this morning, so far as the authority of the committee went, that the witness should answer the questions.

Messrs. Lawrence and Burchard concurred with Prof. Seelye.

MR. FIELD INDULGES IN A THREAT.

Mr. Field—(To the Chairman)—Is it not a case of contempt and misdemeanor under the laws of the District of Columbia, for a witness to refuse to answer questions propounded by a committee?

The Chairman—It is.

The Witness—You cannot deter me.

The Chairman—You will be accommodated.

Witness—I am willing to be accommodated.

Mr. Field—The witness is contumacious in the highest degree.

Mr. Field then exhibited to witness a statement showing the number of votes rejected in the several parishes attested by Charles S. Abell, the Secretary of the Returning Board.

Objection was made to the paper. Question being taken, the objection was overruled by a strict party vote. The statement showed that the board rejected 1,763 Kellogg, and 10,280 McEnery electoral votes. Another paper was exhibited to the witness, also attested by Mr. Abell, showing that the supervisors of Registration certified 71,027 Kellogg, and 80,515 McEnery electoral votes; also the certificate of the Returning Board certifying to the election of the Kellogg electors, and that they received 75,135 votes, and that the McEnery electors received 70,508 votes.

Mr. Field then asked the witness whether, if the return from Vernon Parish, as carried into the tabulated statement, was different from the original return, it was done with his knowledge or approbation. The witness replied it was not, nor had he any knowledge it was done with the approbation of any other member of the board; and he also denied the truth of Littlefield's statement that he directed returns to be altered so as to elect Hunter and Andrews Judge and District Attorney; they were his personal, but not political friends.

Mr. Field interrogated the witness about the papers that the former had exhibited, but witness declined to answer.

Q.—Because you are under duress are you unwilling to tell the truth? Witness—I am never unwilling to tell the truth.

Q.—Then why do you not answer? Witness—When the contempt is removed I will answer, but not till then.

Q.—You were asked just now whether you threw out votes for reasons which were founded on evidence satisfactory to yourself; will you answer? A.—That embraces the whole question, and I therefore decline.

Q.—Will you answer? A.—I tell you I decline.

Q.—Are you not willing to testify whether your board threw out 10,000 and odd votes, honestly or dishonestly? A.—I am willing when relieved from contempt of the House.

Q.—Are you willing to do so now? A.—I cannot answer the question until relieved of such contempt.

Q.—Are you now willing to answer the question whether, in throwing out 10,000 and odd votes, your board acted honestly or dishonestly? A.—We acted in conformity with law.

Q.—In throwing out votes? A.—We threw them out for fraud, intimidation, and violence at the polls.

Q.—Were any thrown out because of irregularities? A.—I think Grant Parish was excluded.

Q.—Any except that? A.—I think not.

Q.—Was there a single objection to the votes on the ground that they were not actually cast? A.—None.

Q.—Then they must have been thrown out on the ground of intimidation? A.—Men were forced to vote contrary to their wishes.

Q.—Had you any witnesses before your board to prove that any particular voters were induced to vote contrary to their wishes? A.—It was impossible to have oral testimony. The board adopted a rule that testimony should be taken by both parties.

Q.—Did the voters themselves testify that they voted under compulsion? Was such evidence furnished to you? A.—I think so.

Q.—Will you say that proof was presented to you that a hundred different voters had voted under compulsion contrary to their judgment? A.—I do not know how many. I think there was evidence of the fact. There may be 100 or 500, or more, who said they were forced to vote contrary to their wishes.

In further examination witness said no votes were rejected except in consequence of intimidation, and, among other things, Mr. Field called the attention of the witness to the fact that it appeared that in the parish of Concordia, Josephs, one of the Republican Electors, received 1,950 votes, while in the certificate of the Returning Board he was credited with 2,538 votes, to which witness replied that it was in evidence that a troop of horsemen seized the ballot-box from the Commissioners of Election, who made up the returns from their count and sent them in.

Mr. Field asked witness whether he did not say before the Morrison Committee that this happened in Madison; witness replied—Yes; and there was something of the kind in Concordia also.

Mr. Field called the attention of the witness to the fact that, while the board by throwing out 10,000 votes cast for the Tilden Electors, gave the Electoral vote for Hayes, the witness omitted to account for their act in thus giving the latter 3,000 or 4,000 majority.

In response to questions by Mr. Lawrence, the witness said the board gave to the Hayes ticket only such votes as it was entitled to receive; that they took no votes from the Democrats contrary to law.

The Committee adjourned until to-morrow.

TESTIMONY OF MR. ABELL, SECRETARY, AND JUDGE DAVIS, CHIEF CLERK OF THE RETURNING BOARD, BEFORE THE SENATE SUB-COMMITTEE.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 6.—The Senate Sub-committee on Louisiana Affairs, of which Mr. Howe is Chairman, met to-day at 11 o'clock, and began the investigation by the examination of Charles S. Abell, who testified that he had resided in New-Orleans since 1871; was the Secretary of the late Louisiana Returning Board; knew Littlefield; recommended him among four as a clerk for the board; recommended him at his [Littlefield's] request; there were objections on the part of the board to his appointment, which were dispelled at witness' solicitation.

Senator McDonald objected to the questions on the ground that they could not bring a witness to break down the previous testimony of one of their own witnesses, both having been called by the same party.

MR. ABELL'S TESTIMONY CONTINUED.

After some discussion it was decided to proceed with the examination. Witness continued: From the parish of Vernon there were no returns received as from the Commissioners; never knew of any paper from there except the consolidated statement of the Supervisor; dined with the board on Sunday, the 3d of December; all returned to the office of the board; Littlefield was at his table; saw him there; did not see him making any erasures; the first intimation witness had of any loss from the Vernon paper was from Littlefield; after the Potter Committee arrived Littlefield told witness that he had destroyed the Vernon papers when the request was made for them; he said that no one had ordered him to destroy the papers; Littlefield promised to make the return good, which he did; the return from Vernon Parish was opened in the presence of the board and the committee from the North, and examined and afterward published; did not see Littlefield afterward until he came him here; the transfer of polls Nos. 8 and 9 of Vernon Parish would have no effect upon the election of any candidate.

In answer to Senator McDonald—Did not know Littlefield until last Summer; saw him nearly every day; witness was in the Legislature, when he first went to Louisiana, from the Parish of Bossier; took his seat Jan. 1, 1871; held the office for two years; held the office of Superintendent of Education at the same time; afterward went to New-Orleans; was first inspection in the Custom-house; received his appointment from the Collector, Col. Casey; held the office for a year; had two or three hours' work whenever a session came in, which happened once in two or three days; received $4 per day; was engaged in speculating until he was appointed Flour Inspector; was Secretary of the Board in the election of 1874; has held both offices since; the pay of the clerks was $12 per day while in session; did not remember of Rapides Parish being thrown out in 1874 on Gov. Wells' statement; received the Vernon return on the 14th of November; did not receive the returns of Vernon Parish from the Secretary of State; such returns might have been received but witness never saw them; the witness never showed Mr. Cassanave the statement of the Commissioners of Vernon Parish; never showed them to anybody; never had such papers in charge or custody; the returns from Vernon Parish were received by the board by mail and not through the office of the Secretary of State; if returns were directed to the Secretary of State they would go to that officer, who would send them back to the Returning Board, and witness would then receipt for them; the returns came frequently in registered packages through the mail; did not see any papers from Vernon except the tabulated statement of the Supervisor and some affidavits; saw the latter on the desks of Mr. Green, the minute Clerk; did not know that he gave the affidavits from Vernon Parish to Mr. Cassanave; they may have been among the many he gave him; Mr. Cassanave always receipted for the papers he received, specifying the papers received, and from what parish; did not think the parties were mentioned; did not know that Mr. Cassanave inquired especially for the statement of the Commissioners of Election, but he saw them all; thought there were 10 polls in Vernon Parish; Vernon and Rapides composed a Senatorial district; didn't know what parishes were included in the Judicial district; knew that Hunter was a candidate, but could not remember other names; the first promulgation of the State election was the aggregate vote by parishes; it was made up when the returns came in; the board remained in secret session about a week; ceased to receive testimony in regard to contested polls after the open sessions were held; held secret sessions in the private room of the Lieutenant Governor; furnished the Republican visiting committee the statement of the face of the returns by personal request; did not remember furnishing a statement to the other side; furnished Gov. Palmer with papers, but he did not ask for the same facilities as were given to the other side; furnished him with all he asked for; saw Judge Ray, the attorney for the board, in the secret sessions; didn't know that he was an attorney for the Republicans; had not seen him in consultation with Republicans; the tabulated statement that was shown to the Republican visitors showed a large Democratic majority, but it did not include all the returns; knows D. M. A. Jewett; he is United States Commissioner; witness was shown certain affidavits, and stated he did not recognize them; had never seen them before; when the House Committee were asking for affidavits they were furnished with all they desired; originals were furnished in all cases, witness believes; does not know that the committee were refused sight of the originals; does not know that the original affidavits in the Vernon Parish case were refused to the committee; was at a dinner at the "Four Seasons" restaurant; it cost the Republican Committee $40 or more; wine and cocktails were drank; that was the night before the board began their session; the clerks had no chance to go home to dinner, and witness got the State Committee to stand treat; the dinner lasted an hour and a half; the wine was the worse for the wines and the cocktails; quit work that night at midnight; thought that the bill for the dinner was paid by witness before the parties left—the saloon; Littlefield might have been present when the bill was paid; certified to 178 votes for the Republicans from Vernon Parish, having full confidence in the returns; don't think witness knew nothing about the transposition of the votes; the copy that Littlefield made was put on file by witness; there was no statement made that the original had been destroyed or lost, but the paper purported to be a correct copy of the original; saw the copy last about the 1st of January; when he gave the House Committee a copy, it was certified as a correct copy of the statement on file in the office; Littlefield was still on the board when witness told him to make a copy of the Vernon return, but he left a few days after; Littlefield told witness to say nothing about it, but never told the next morning; Littlefield was not seen by witness afterward; supposed he had gone to see his father, who was sick in Boston, and carried him on the pay-rolls for several days.

By Senator Saulsbury—The changes in the Vernon return, not returned before the 25th of December, did not state to the Senate Committee that the Vernon return was a copy of a copy; supposed it was the true return, as it was copied from a blotter.

By Senator Wadleigh—Did not know of any changes until so informed by Littlefield; the compiling of returns in the office was done by the clerks calling them off from one to another, and Littlefield or any other clerk could falsify returns by calling off false figures.

EVIDENCE OF JUDGE DAVIS.

Judge Davis was examined by Senator Wadleigh, and testified that he was Chief Clerk in the office of the late Returning Board; knew Littlefield; did not see him talking with Gov. Wells or making any erasures; first heard of any change in the returns when he read it in the papers; investigated the papers and saw that the Vernon return had been changed; could not find the original; Littlefield said first it was gone, then lost, and afterward destroyed; reported the fact to Abell; the clerks were ordered to complete the papers in the office; witness furnished all the data for the required copy, that he could find in the office; Littlefield said they agreed with the original; Littlefield made the copy which was filed with the other returns; Littlefield did not give any notice of his going away; learned from Mr. Woodward that he had received a telegram from his father up North to the effect that he was dying; Littlefield called off the figures to be copied, and if he so desired he could falsify the returns; there was no opportunity for reviewing the work; the change of votes in polls Two and Nine would affect no candidate; the papers purporting to be Commissioners' statements were not regarded as authentic, as they had been received by the Secretary of State from strangers; in the data forwarded by witness didn't remember whether anything was wanting in polls Two and Nine; Littlefield said the Commissioners' report and the consolidated statement, with the exception of two votes, agreed.

By Senator Saulsbury—Witness did not compare them; the consolidated statement came to the office from the Secretary of State's office unopened, but the Commissioner's statement came with a letter from the Secretary of State; the consolidated statement was considered the authentic one; if the source of the Commissioner's report had been known it would have been considered better authority than the consolidated statement; the two votes that were wanting were not put in, but were rejected; the witness first made inquiries about the Vernon return, having read about the false 178 Republican votes; Littlefield did not say the paper had been destroyed by instruction; he informed only Mr. Abell, the Secretary of the board; the duties of the witness as Chief Clerk were to supervise the work of the clerks; the tabulated statement of the returns, and assisted in footing up the columns on the last day of the canvass; he looked the work over as far as possible to verify it; the canvass was made up from the Supervisors' returns, after comparison and verification with the reports of the Commissioners and the tally-sheets; the canvass and verification in Vernon Parish was made from the Supervisors' returns alone, because there was nothing else that was authentic to verify by; in the instance of the consolidated return of Vernon Parish, witness remembers it was received from the mail-carrier, although the same was addressed to the Secretary of State; there sometimes fees due on packages which the carriers had to come to the board-room to receive; don't remember that any fees were collected on the packages received from Vernon Parish; witness remembers it was brought by a carrier, as he would remember almost any circumstance; the returns were registered as they came in, and numbered for easy reference; there was no entry made in the case of this Vernon return received from the Secretary of State; if the returns from Vernon had been promulgated as received from the Supervisors, the other candidates for District Judge and District Attorney would have been declared elected. The witness testified as to furnishing copies of returns and affidavits to the Congressional Committees.

EVIDENCE OF COMMISSIONER JEWETT.

D. J. M. A. Jewett was sworn, and stated that he resides in New-Orleans, and is a United States Commissioner; as such Commissioner the witness took the affidavits of four persons in relation to Vernon Parish, on the 14th and 16th of November; the parties to them appeared and took the customary oath before witness; there was an understanding that the person taking the first testimony of a parish should think it, and on the 19th of November these affidavits were forwarded to the board by a messenger named Joe; witness saw the messenger inside the door of the board-room.

The witness was questioned at some length by Mr. Saulsbury and Mr. McDonald.

One witness testified that he was called to a printed circular which he stated he wrote and addressed to many of the Supervisors of Election, in which they were required to make the registration so full as to insure Republican majorities and told that if they did so their reward would be ample and generous. The witness stated that he meant that their reward would be the same as the agents of Nicholls would receive if his side should win; there were several Democratic Supervisors in the State; perhaps as many as 10 out of 70 odd, but witness would not answer that there were that number; witness' attention was called to the fact that in the affidavits sworn to by Collins, the affiant swore that he was a resident but not a registered voter of Vernon Parish, and said it did not strike him as at all singular that a man, who by his own statement was not a voter, should come forward to make an affidavit; witness had seen the returns of Vernon Parish, with the accompanying affidavits, since the four original affidavits passed out of witness' hands. The witness explained at length the manner of registering voters, and the legal requirements connected therewith.

The committee, at 4:15 o'clock, adjourned till to-morrow morning at 10 o'clock.

IN ANSWER TO "JUSTICE."

CROSS LIGHTS ON 'FRISCO.

A CORRESPONDENT'S DEFENSE—NOT A WOMAN IN THE CASE—THE UPSTART MILLIONAIRES AND THE ARROGANCE OF WEALTH—HARD RAPS FOR VENAL CRITICS.

SAN FRANCISCO, Friday, Jan. 26, 1877.

There is an unwritten law which forbids newspaper correspondents from replying to attacks upon themselves. For the most part we recognize the fact that we do not need defense, and that the general reader cares little for Tweedle-dum or Tweedle-dee. His interest in the correspondent is confined entirely to his correspondence, and he is in no way mindful of the individual behind the letters. That I break a rule which I have always observed, and whose soundness I heartily acknowledge, is due to the fact that the Californian who attacks me under the nom de plume of "Justice" has most unjustly whipped another over my shoulders. He has addressed the editor of THE TIMES for a most unmanly purpose, and therefore I desire to meet his accusations, and to repel them, to expose his ignorance and disingenuousness, and to disabuse the minds of the readers of THE TIMES that their old acquaintance, Gar, would be capable of willful misrepresentation to please a fair lady or to tickle the vanities of a coterie. It is well known in San Francisco that the bulk of my information has been received from gentlemen, notably from four, every one of whom enjoys and deserves an elevated position and a high reputation. That I have been well received in certain feminine circles, and that the lady to whom "Justice" makes such pointed reference has treated me with exceeding kindness, is undeniably true, but that I received from her the statements which have so galled the San Franciscans and so amused the rest of the American world is absolutely false, and I denounce it as such. In the letter which mentioned the "long lunches," it is directly stated that the information came from a gentleman, and the effort to fix the onus upon one certain lady has filled me with equal surprise and indignation. I denounce the attempt as unmanly and instigated by something very far remote indeed from justice.

Having disposed of this misstatement, I proceed to examine more directly into the letter of "Justice." He commences by stating that probably such a picture as I have drawn might have been true once, but that now it is a tale of other days. This reminds me forcibly of the dispute as to the existence of chills and fever in that delightful spot, Staten Island. The wanderer seeking for Summer board for himself and family, and instructed thereanent by his spouse, inquires, "Have you any chills and fever here?" The answer comes with a strong show of virtuous indignation, "Not a chill, not one. No, siree; we used to have 'em pretty bad, but since the new improvements, the building and the breaking up of the soil, there hasn't been a single case in the place. Over the hill they've got 'em rayther heavy, I understand." The exact words of "Justice" are an amusing proof of his ignorance of the land he defends so boldly. He says: "It can readily be imagined that in the early days of California history, when men were making huge fortunes in a day by the discovery of gold in all the mountains and streams, and when it seemed that by the touch of the magical wand the horny-fisted miner was transformed from impecuniosity to the possession of great wealth, the treasures of the earth proved to be a greater curse than a blessing, and that the impulses of the enrobed were not always in the direction of the highest good." This highly poetical prose seems to intimate that placer-digging and gold-washing gave to men huge fortunes in a single day. How the miners would chuckle over such a statement! Men in the early days may have made some money, but it is absolutely certain that until the development of the Comstock Lode no huge fortunes were vouchsafed by Providence to any one from mining in California. Now this is hardly 15 years ago, and instead of those times having passed away we are now in the very thick of them. To whom will the words of "Justice" more appositely apply than to Messrs. Flood, O'Brien, Mackey, and Fair, who, from the humblest positions, have been raised to the undesirable eminence which immense wealth gives to those who are incapable of comprehending its uses or of performing its duties. For the character of these men I will quote from the leading paper of San Francisco, which, in this morning's issue, says as follows:

"Last year, however, those persons, whom flattery and adulation have, with fulsome sycophancy, dubbed 'Bonanza Kings,' 'Comstock Princes,' and other base anti-republican fustian, but who in fact are the least kingly or noble, and the most greedy, selfish, piggish, and narrow-souled among men of wealth, refused altogether to pay their taxes; and have forced the State into a lawsuit to collect them."

The general feeling of sensible men is that deference to a certain degree is due to wealth and official position, not on account of the individuals in possession, but because a healthy conservative spirit knows no better way for the defense of property in the abstract against the proletarianism of the age. But the bonanza people are too much even for the endurance of San Franciscans, and hence this cry of hearty indignation extorted from the paper I quote.

That I have praised Senator Sharon and Jim Keene seems to have given more offense to this honest writer than the attacks upon the snobbery of Nob Hill, and the barbarism of the long lunches. For my own part, I protest that nothing so gladdens my critical heart as an opportunity for sincere praise. To laud Jim Keene was an easy task, for he has the culture and instincts of a gentleman, and is one of the most agreeable men breathing. To applaud him, then, was as natural as for water to gush from a spring. The hearty approbation I have given to Senator Sharon was due not by any means to the likings of any lady, nor to any personal regard of my own, for the Senator is by no means an individual for whom one conceives regard at the first meeting. Queen Elizabeth, who loved to look upon a man, would have hated to look upon the Senator from Nevada—for he is small of stature, insignificant in feature, reticent and self-contained in conversation. Nor does he, as many such men have done, wrap himself round with a mantle of icy dignity. On the contrary, his talk and manners are characterized by abruptness, and by a nervous roughness and disregard of the feelings of others not calculated to impress very highly a correspondent who has an uncommonly good opinion of himself. But who would not be fired to an enthusiasm of praise by such an act of devotion to the memory of his dead comrade as he shared when he assumed all the burdens which had broken down Ralston and placed the penniless widow at once in a position of comparative affluence. I do not speak of the affairs of the Bank of California, for there the chief merit is undoubtedly due to D. O. Mills. But I refer to the different schemes in which Ralston was engaged, and which ruined him, or rather were the lever by which the bonanza people ruined him. There was the Palace Hotel, a white elephant 10 years ahead of the needs of California; there was the West Coast Furniture Company; there was the Alameda Water Company; there was the San Mateo Homestead Land, and many others which I do not at present recollect. Sharon assumed them, careless whether they were capable of profitable development or certain to culminate in positive loss, and only anxious to save the good name of his friend and comrade. I protest that it gladdens my very heart to think of such a thing, and to know that this little man who looks like Thersites, has the soul within of Tydeus. In my experience of journalism, I only know of one other such act, and that was done by Giles F. Filley, of St. Louis, who was entrapped by his brother-in-law into indorsing bills to the amount of $1,300,000, and who instead of going into bankruptcy, and evading the payment, asked for time, and within seven years paid the whole amount, principal and interest. My blood is stirred when I hear of heroic deeds, and I feel a positive pleasure in applauding such men. "Justice," it seems, is of another kidney.

I pass to a consideration of the last charge, that in obedience to the prejudices of this lady, I have been severe upon the bonanza people. With regard to the lady's participation in my censure, I have sufficiently answered that. Let me, then, consider the facts in relation to the establishment of the Bank of Nevada. I have stated that the aim and interest of the bonanza people was to crush out the Bank of California. That view is accepted by every bonanza man with whom I have conversed upon this point. "Justice" is of a different opinion. But in support of my view, I may state that when the clearing-house system was mooted in San Francisco the Bank of Nevada refused to join in the movement. The answer of Mr. Flood is reported by bankers to have been that he didn't hire a hall for the public to do their banking in, but for the convenience of his own business, and that he did not propose to show his hand. And though the clearing-house system is in full operation to-day in this city, the Bank of Nevada still keeps aloof. The opinion of commercial minds on this fact was forcibly given in some of the financial papers of New-York, notably, I believe, in the Bulletin, which advised the public to have nothing to do with an institution which wrapped its operations in secrecy. The public of San Francisco has taken that advice, and, to quote the words of a very accomplished informant, the "Bank of Ireland," as it is nicknamed, is a bank of last resort, to which no one goes unless he is in such a condition that he must accept whatever terms are offered him.

As to the ability and tact with which the bonanza people manage their affairs, I need only refer to the farcical behavior of Mr. Mackey at the last meeting of the shareholders of Consolidated Virginia. A Mr. Dewey attacked the management bitterly, and reiterated the charges which I made against mine management in general, that the reduction of the ore was placed at a fabulous figure, and the high percentage of tailings was a gross fraud. To these and other charges Mr. Mackey, in a strong Irish accent, answered: "Come up and see the moine for yerselves. Av yees'll come up till the moine oi'l pee your feers, and thrate yees to cigars and all the woine yees can dhrink." Imagine the President of a great company making such a response to a series of grave charges universally accepted as genuine. Nor did the incapacity of Mr. Mackey end here. An ex-member of the English Parliament, a man of high reputation and a friend of the ex-Premier, desired to ask some questions as a large holder of Consolidated Virginia, and was answered that he was only an Englishman, and didn't know anything about American mining anyway. The leading paper of San Francisco published an account of this remarkable meeting, and as its authenticity has not been contested it must be presumed to be correct. Immense wealth invariably acts as a charm upon the minds of weak persons, and they see its possessor through a golden glamour. The writer of the article signed "Justice" seems to imagine that because a quartet of men became suddenly immensely wealthy, they are to be credited with all the attributes which in other communities go hand in hand with wealth. It is not so. Although they are millionaires, the bonanza firm is still composed of a bar-keeper, a livery-stable man, and two horny-fisted miners. They have changed their skins, but can neither change their habits nor their souls.

All this balderdash about the early days of California is nothing, and only calculated to mislead. The society of the early days of the State was, in all human probability, superior to what it is to-day intellectually. It would have been so morally, only for the fact that it was a land of refuge. Californian society at the present moment is suffering more than ever from the oppression of huge fortunes in incompetent hands. Wealth possessed by an Astor or a Vanderbilt or a Seligman is a reservoir. It was such in the hands of Ralston. But wealth in the hands of the bonanza quartet is a stagnant marsh, breeding noxious insects and filling the air with moral fevers. I could not possibly better show the position of things here than by the simple statement that in this small city there are three weekly papers that live by very questionable method. These bugs that sting and stink have lampooned and caricatured me for many weeks past with undeviating regularity. As the Scotch proverb observes that "it is ill getting breeks frae a Highlandman," so I may say that to get blackmail from a correspondent is as impossible as to get blood out of a turnip. Somebody must pay for these articles, for one does not go to the trouble to the dirty bread which these creatures earn. If I mention them at all, it is to show that some galled jades have winced very much at my letters. But, in conclusion, I would ask the readers of THE TIMES to believe that I am more likely to be right in my strictures, as I now the scene with calm, unprejudiced, undirected eyes, than the Californians, who are to their faults exceedingly blind, and to their virtues most outrageously kind. 'STURBING A MEETIN'.

HOW A YOUNG WOMAN GOT UP AN EXCITEMENT IN A COLORED CHURCH.

From the St. Louis Republican, Feb. 3.

The ante-rooms of the Court of Criminal Correction were crowded yesterday with colored people of both sexes, most of whom had been summoned as witnesses in the case of the State against Lizzie Huggins, a pudgy, fat-faced, fiery-eyed little colored woman, who labored under the charge of disturbing the religious congregation of the Mount Zion Church, on Jan. 22. The case was called at 10:30 o'clock, and the two armies of witnesses stood in rows, glared at all sorts of things at each other, and sworo to tell the whole truth, utter which they were excluded.

The principal witness for the State, and the instigator of the prosecution, was Rev. Thomas Jefferson Jones, the Pastor of the disturbed flock. He was a dignified, middle-aged party with a cane and gaudy necktie, and was evidently not above having an opinion of his own about some ungodly folks. He testified that on the night in question he was in the pulpit, begging the brethern to come to the Lord—at least to the mourners' bench—when that Lizzie Muggins got up and says she; "What bizness you got 'zortin' nigger sinners to come to the mourners' bench? Better clean your own self before you ger clean there 'sortin' sinners—you bad. You an' 'Manda Taggett goin' 'roun' and doin' your devilishness, an' then you comin' here an' 'zortin'!" Witness, as soon as he could get a word in, hollered out, "Order in the congregation!" and then Lizzie Huggins' husband went to the bench and told her to get up and come right out of that church. She was his'n and she had to come. But Lizzie Huggins she got up and said she wouldn't come, and she wasn't going to come, and none of them devilish niggers could make her come. And the congregation got so excited that witness had to give it up and dismiss them.

On cross-examination, the witness repeated his story in somewhat greater detail. Being asked whether or not his allusions about 'Manda Taggett were true, witness replied that that was his and Manda's business. The charge was "'sturbin' de congregation," and he was ready to prove that that congregation was mightily 'sturbed.

The next witness was a young man, who testified that everything went along peaceable-like that night; another gentleman and then Mr. Johnson preached, and; just as Mr. Johnson was going to pronounce the doxology, Lizzie Huggins jumped up and raised a commotion, making remarks about the minister and 'Manda Taggett; then Lizzie Huggins' husband went to where she was sitting, and says he; "Come out of this church, Lizzie Huggins; you's my meat; you b'longs to me;" but Lizzie said that no devilish niggas could put her out; and everybody got to kicking up a muss, and so they couldn't go on with any more business, and the meeting got broken up.

Several other witnesses, and among them the 'Manda Taggett referred to, who is a saucy-looking wench, testified to about the same state of facts, all agreeing that Lizzie Huggins had advised the minister to clean the mourners' bench by mending his own ways before 'zortin' other sinners to come and be saved.

Then the defense introduced as a witness the venerable Deacon Sam Gobout. He said he had witnessed the commotion, and he believed it started all along of the preacher. The commotion looked like it was all over the church, and not much of anywhere in particular. Witness watched it awhile, "to see what is what," and he couldn't make much our of it. "Remarks was a drappin all roun'," said he, "an' if Lizzie Huggins said anything, which I doesn't say but she did, it was all 'long of what the preacher was a sayin'. He was a sayin' the congregation was like mules, an' tellin' 'em to come up to de mourners' bench, a tole-him to drap that talk an' tend to his gospel, but he wouldn't do it, an' so there was a row. An' then—but if you's got 'nuff I'll quit, Mister Judge."

The witness was excused and another came on, who testified that the minister was calling people monkeys and rabbits, and billy goats and heathen, all because they wouldn't come up to the mourners' bench, and that's what made Lizzie Huggins tell him he'd better clean that mourners' bench first—he'd better quit his devilry with 'Manda Taggess. She didn't make much more fuss than anyone else neither.

Another witness testified that the preacher was calling sinners villifying names, and saying "it was a shame to see so many sinners standin' back there, snickerin' an' laffin' an' not comin' for'ard to get their souls saved." There wasn't much of a fuss, either, an' the preacher he says, "Lizzie Huggins, I'll jerk some money outen you to-morrer—see if I don't." The meeting was "ostensibly" over, anyhow.

Rachael Smith testified that she was asleep in one of the pews, and was awakened by the row, and she didn't see Lizzie Huggins do anything wrong.

Judge Cady suggested to Lizzie that she ought to have secured an ecclesiastical trial of her Pastor if she didn't like his ways. She replied that she tried that and it got smothered, so she just talked right out in meeting. But she didn't disturb the meeting.

Judge Cady said she might have occasioned the loss of numerous souls by thus depriving them of an opportunity to go to the mourners' bench.

Well, she didn't keep anybody from going to the mourners' bench. Preacher Jones had told her himself that 'Manda Taggett tried to seduce him, and he just got mad because she sold it in meeting. Lizzie was fined $1 and cost.

FORTY-FOURTH CONGRESS.

SUMMARY OF THE DAY'S PROCEEDINGS.

In the Senate the bill to appropriate $500,000 for the Mississippi jetties was reported adversely from the Appropriations Committee. The Indian Appropriation bill was reported with amendments. A memorial from the Regents of the Smithsonian Institution asking an appropriation for the erection of a building adjoining the Institution, for the exhibition of articles contributed by foreign Governments to the Centennial exhibition and afterward presented to the United States, was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. The conference on the Post Route bill failed to agree on the clauses providing for Fast Mail Service and the restoration of franking. The bill to provide for a sinking fund for the payment of the Pacific Railroad indebtedness to the Government was discussed without action. The bill to abolish the District Police Board failed to receive the two-thirds necessary to pass it over the President's veto.

In the House the Deficiency Appropriation bill was considered in Committee of the Whole. It calls for $1,417,000.

SENATE.

The Senate reassembled at 10 A. M. to-day, and immediately took another recess until 12 o'clock, when Mr. CONKLING, of New-York, presented the petition of 610 citizens of New-York in favor of a sixteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States prohibiting the several States from disfranchising citizens on account of sex; also a petition of officers of the National Woman's Suffrage Association of a similar character.

THE FREEDMEN'S BANK PROPERTY.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio, reported favorably on the House bill authorizing the Commissioners of the Freedmen's Savings and Trust Company to buy in certain real estate and other property, and to sell the same at public or private sale. In explanation of the bill, he said it was to allow the Commissioners to convey perfect title to certain property sold by them, the question having been raised by some purchasers as to the right of the Commissioners to convey the property.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania, moved to amend the bill so as to require the Commissioners to sell property at public sale only.

The amendment of Mr. Cameron was rejected, and, objection being made to the further consideration of the bill, it was laid over.

THE JETTIES APPROPRIATION.

Mr. WINDOM, of Minnesota, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported adversely on the House bill to provide for the payment of James B. Eads for the construction of jetties at the south pass of the Mississippi River, and it was placed on the calendar with the adverse report. It authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to pay out of any unappropriated money in the Treasury, $500,000 to said Eads whenever the Secretary of War shall determine that that amount is due Mr. Eads by the terms of his contract.

THE INDIAN APPROPRIATION.

Mr. ALLISON, of Iowa, from the same committee, reported back the Indian Appropriation bill, with sundry amendments. Placed on the calendar.

CAPT. HALL'S SECOND ARCTIC EXPEDITION.

Mr. SARGENT, of California, submitted a resolution calling upon the Secretary of the Navy to furnish the Senate with the narrative of the second expedition to the Arctic regions, made by C. F. Hall, said narrative to be compiled from the notes of such expedition, purchased from the widow of Capt. Hall. Agreed to.

AMMUNITION TO BE ISSUED TO STATES WITH ARMS.

Mr. COCKRELL, of Missouri, reported favorably on the Senate joint resolution to amend the joint resolution of July 3, 1876, authorizing the Secretary of War to issue arms to certain States and Territories so as to issue ammunition not to exceed 50 ball cartridges for each arm. Passed.

A NATIONAL MUSEUM.

Mr. STEVENSON, of Kentucky, presented a memorial of the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution asking appropriations of $250,000 to erect a building adjoining the Smithsonian Institution for the exhibition of goods presented by foreign Governments to the United States, which goods were lately on exhibition at Philadelphia.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont, spoke of the importance of a building for a national museum, and said the Centennial buildings and Grounds unanimously favored the purchase of certain squares near the Capitol for a national museum and library buildings. Fifty car-loads of articles had been given to the United States, and their money value was scarcely computable. A building should be erected for them, as they, both in a historical and economical point of view, surpassed anything exhibited in any national museum on the globe.

Mr. SARGENT spoke of the great value of the articles, and said they should be properly exhibited. Their exhibition would be furnishing educational facilities of the most valuable character.

The memorial was then referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

THE LEGISLATIVE APPROPRIATIONS.

The Legislative, Judicial, and Executive Appropriations bill was received from the House of Representatives and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

FAST MAILS AND THE FRANKING PRIVILEGE.

Mr. HAMLIN, of Maine, from the Conference Committee on the disagreeing votes of the two houses on the bill establishing certain post routes, which involves the question of restoring the Fast Mail trains and the franking privilege, reported that the Committee had been unable to agree. He moved that a new conference, asked for by the House of Representatives, be granted. So ordered.

Subsequently he said the House had not appointed its members of the new conference, although the bill had been sent to the Senate, and he moved that the bill be returned to the House, that that body might appoint its members of the committee first. Agreed to.

THE PACIFIC RAILROAD SINKING-FUND BILL.

The morning hour having expired, the Senate resumed consideration of the unfinished business, being the bill to amend the Pacific railroad acts, so as to create a sinking fund for liquidation of the indebtedness to the Government of the Pacific Railroad Company.

Mr. HITCHCOCK, of Nebraska, spoke in opposition to the bill reported by the Judiciary Committee. He referred to the advantages which had been enjoyed by the country on account of the construction of the Pacific Railroad, and said that prior to 1862 the transportation of mails and munitions of war in the West coat the Government $7,300,000 per annum, while the whole amount of interest is now paid on the Pacific Railroad amounted to but $3,800,000 per annum. The people of this country never expected that the bonds loaned to the Pacific railroad companies would be paid except by transporting mails, &c., for the Government. In support of his argument he quoted extensively from the debates in Congress when the original act was passed. He contended that the bill reported by the Judiciary Committee proposed a new contract; a different one from that which the country offered to the capitalists to build this road when it was in danger of losing its Pacific possessions. He did not believe the American people desired a bill of this kind to pass. It violated the contract of the Government, and could not be justified. The American people did not require their Representatives here to enact such a measure in their name.

Mr. BOUTWELL, of Massachusetts, said he only proposed to discuss some of the legal points involved in the bill reported by the Judiciary Committee. He quoted from the Pacific Railroad acts, and denied that Congress had power to alter and am the plaintiff. The jury, having failed to agree at a late hour yesterday afternoon, were locked up for the night.

COURT OF GENERAL SESSIONS.

RECORDER HACKETT'S CHARGE TO THE GRAND JURY — HIS REFERENCE TO FRAUDS AMONG TRUSTEES AND OTHERS.

At the opening of the Court of General Sessions yesterday Recorder Hackett charged the Grand Jury, in accordance with the requirements of the statute, directing them to inquire into all violations of the law relating to lotteries, usury, illegal fees, elections, and excise. His Honor continued:

Since yesterday I have examined the calendar for the present term. You, as conservators of the peace of the country, will be pleased to know that the weight of crime on the calendar is comparatively light. This is mainly due to the zeal of the District Attorney's office and the energetic industry of my learned associates, who since I last sat here have continuously held two courts during six weeks. It is only fair that the community that I should add that notwithstanding commercial distress, hard times, and the strong temptations of pressing poverty, metropolitan crime decreases among the lower and middle classes. It seems, however, to have increased among the intelligent, the educated, and those of social influence. Some time since I had occasion to charge a Grand Jury respecting frauds among Trustees and officers of commercial institutions; since then the calendar discloses that not only among savings banks but among life insurance corporations, frauds have intensified. Some of these latter cases may be presented to you, as by the issuance of District Attorney Phelps and others they are laid before your predecessors. It is hard enough for families to lose their hard-earned savings, but it is worse luck for a man who, during several years has paid life insurance premiums, only to awaken some morning and find that his family has not only lost their premiums, but that his indorsements or life policies are mere valueless lots of printed paper, and that if he is to reinsure his life it has to be done at a very largely-increased premium for a fresh risk of advancing years. A loss and peril like this, if occasioned by the greed, recklessness, or dishonesty of life insurance guardians, is closely allied to the meanest of crimes. Therefors, should any such cases come before you, probe them, no matter in what portion of the body politic they may fester. You can have the assistance of the District Attorney and his assistants in all cases where your judgment may be at fault, and should avail yourselves of his counsel. It will be your duty to examine carefully into the various complaints which shall be laid before you, and satisfy yourselves before finding an indictment, that the evidence is sufficient to warrant it.

THE RIGHT TO PLAY "DIE DANISCHEFFS."

Judge Donohue, in Supreme Court, Chambers, yesterday rendered a decision in the suit of Shook & Palmer against Adolf Neuendorf, which was before the court on a motion to render permanent an injunction restraining the defendant from performing the play of "Die Danischeffs." The plaintiffs claimed their right from the authors, while the defendant set up an alleged abandonment of the authors' rights by the publication of the play in Germany and Austria. Judge Donohue in his opinion says:

"In this case it seems to me, on careful consideration of the papers, that plaintiffs have clearly made out their title by purchase to the use of the play in dispute. When, as in this case, the defendant sets up no title other than the abandonment, by its author, of the play to the public, and presents no equitable title to it, he must be prepared to show an authorized publication, beyond any doubt, of the play which he claims the right to perform. This, it seems to me, he has not done in this case. The principal ground on which he puts his case is, that what he proves as an abandonment could not have existed if such was not the fact. Unfortunately, too many instances of unauthorized use of other people's property exist to make the presence of such use proof of its being rightful. * * * His claim that the plaintiffs themselves do not pretend that they will lose money by the defendant's performance, and so are not entitled to any injunction, is without weight, because, should plaintiffs not enjoin defendants, their act will be an evidence to others that plaintiffs have permitted the public use of the play, and will so destroy their right. Some other party will come forward, and as a defense to using it in English, will show defendant's performance, and argue, as defendant does, that it must have been authorized or it would not have occurred. Motion to continue injunction granted." Ex-Judge Dittenoefer appeared for the plaintiffs, and Henry Wehle for the defendant.

SUIT ON A MARRIED WOMAN'S NOTE.

The suit of Thomas J. Husson against Harriet N. Trask was brought to trial before Chief Justice Curtis and a jury, in Part III. of the Superior Court, yesterday. The plaintiff brought his suit on a note given by the defendant, who is a married woman, and the wife of Benjamin J. H. Trask. This note was given under rather singular circumstances. It appears that Husson and Mr. Trask did business with each other, and on one occasion they exchanged checks for $3,000. Trask deposited Husson's check in bank and drew against it. When Husson tried to do likewise with regard to Trask's check, he found that the latter was worthless. Husson had in bank originally about $400. When Trask had drawn against his account to the amount of his check the account was $2,600 short. Husson deposited 60 bonds of the Secretan Dry Dock Company to secure the overdraft by Trask, and went to the latter to make some arrangements for the payment of the money drawn. He could make no satisfactory arrangements with Trask, however. The bank then became solicitous about the overdraft, and threatened Husson that unless the $2,600 they would sell the stock deposited. Husson went again to Trask, and the latter then offered to raise money on the stock. Husson obtained the stock and gave it to Trask, who raised $6,000 on it. He accounted, as alleged, for only $3,000 of the money, and afterward sold the stock. On discovering that the bonds had been sold, Husson threatened to proceed against Trask for his conduct. To save her husband, Mrs. Trask then made the note on which the suit was brought. The note was, by its terms, made a charge upon her separate estate. The defense to the suit was that the wife could not be held liable for her husband's indebtedness, and that her separate estate could not be charged with debts not incurred for her benefit. The jury, after a few minutes' deliberation, brought in a verdict for the plaintiff for $7,371 96, that being the null amount claimed, with interest. Mr. Woodrich appeared for the plaintiff and Isaac L. Egbert for the defendant.

AN ARTIST'S PERPLEXITIES.

Messrs. Doll & Richards, picture dealers of Boston, made an agreement with George Inness, an artist, whereby he was to furnish them with all of his productions, which they were to sell on commission. By the agreement he was to receive advances to enable him to prosecute his travels and studies. He sent to them 14 pictures, which he values at $24,200, and obtained an advance of $4,500. He then sent them 11 other pictures, valued by him at $15,000, and received an advance of $2,377. One picture, known as the "Pine Grove of Bartarina Villa," he received back for the purpose of retouching it for exhibition at the Philadelphia Exposition. Messrs. Doll & Richards claim that he sold the picture and pocketed the proceeds. They sue for its recovery, and obtained an order of arrest against Inness. The latter made a motion to vacate the arrest, but this was denied. He moved before Judge Barrett, in Supreme Court, Chambers, yesterday, for a rehearing of the motion to vacate the arrest, but this was also denied. In defense Mr. Inness says he was in great measure in the power of Messrs. Doll & Richards, and that they did not fulfill their agreement. They did not try to sell his pictures, he claims, but stored them away in a cellar. He had spent 12 weeks, he said, in retouching the "Pine Grove of Bartarina Villa," and had offered to repay the loan of $2,377 which, in his ignorance of business affairs, he supposed was all that was necessary for him to do.

WILL BE CONTENT WITH $25,000 DAMAGES.

Sarah Earl, a dress-maker of this City, brought a suit in the Superior Court to recover $25,000 of John Fink and A. S. Spaulding for personal injuries, and the case was brought to trial before Judge Speir and a jury, in Part II. of the court, yesterday. It appears that the plaintiff was walking on Eighth avenue on May 28, 1873. Fink owned a building on the avenue, and had on the sidewalk in front a box containing shutters for the store. Mr. Spaulding, who is a dealer in provisions, had a horse and wagon standing in the street in front of the store, and something happening to frighten the horse, the animal started and pushed the wagon into the box of shutters, which fell on the plaintiff. The latter fell to the ground severely bruised and stunned. She was confined to her bed on account of the injuries for several months, and still suffers from the effect of them. The defendants put in a general denial. The case was given to the jury, who, failing to agree in time, were locked up for the night with instructions to bring in a sealed verdict. Charles S. Spencer appeared for the plaintiff, and George W. Maddam for the defendant.

A DISPOSSESSION CASE.

Charles Michenfelder applied to Judge Barrett, in Supreme Court, Chambers, yesterday, for a peremptory mandamus to compel Patrick Reilly, a City Marshal, to execute a warrant of dispossession against one William Sohn, who occupies the premises No. 171 Suffolk street. Sohn had made default in the rent, but claims to have a counter-action against Michenfelder, his landlord. Michenfelder then applied to Justice Dinkel for a summons in dispossession proceedings. On the return day of the summons, Justice Dinkel was not present in court, his place being filled by Justice Callahan. The latter issued the warrant of dispossession as Justice Dinkel's substitute, and the question involved is as to whether one Justice can act in the place of another in such a proceeding. This point has never been decided, and the City Marshal is not willing to execute the warrant, since such action may subject him to a suit for trespass. Judge Barrett denied the application for a mandamus, holding that Michenfelder should pursue his remedy by action in the usual way.

COURT NOTES.

Capt. James Milward, of this City, was yesterday sworn in by Judge Johnson, of the United States Circuit Court, as Consul to Ghent.

The engrossed findings in the suit of the Sixth Avenue Railroad Company against the Gilbert Elevated Railroad Company were filed in the Superior Court Clerk's office yesterday.

Chewell Jenkin, the man charged with setting fire to the clothing store of Isidor Cohen, at No. 94 Catharine street, on Sunday evening, was discharged yesterday at the Tombs Police Court, having proved an alibi.

Jean B. H. Vandeveldeen and his wife, the Belgian forgers, who were recently arrested in Indiana, arrived in this City yesterday, and were taken before Commissioner White. They will have a hearing, preparatory to being extradited, on the 8th instant.

The suit in the Court of Common Pleas whereby Edwin Booth sought to restrain Messrs. Jarrett & Palmer from using the name "Booth's Theatre" as the title of the building at Twenty-third street and Sixth avenue, was discontinued yesterday.

Judge Speir, in the Superior Court, Special Term, yesterday, denied the motion for a reference in the suit of Francis Morris against William Webb, which is brought to recover about $40,000 on a note which the defendant failed to collect and the makers of which failed.

Judge Barrett reserved his decision yesterday, on a motion by the defendant in the two suits of Graham against Harrington, to have the judgments obtained by the plaintiff vacated and set aside. Harrington claims he was induced, by fraudulent representations, to confess judgment.

Richard Supple, a bar-tender, who was convicted of stealing $837 from George Lemond, a United States seaman, in a saloon at No. 179 Cherry street, was brought up for sentence yesterday in Part II. of the Court of General Sessions. Judge Sutherland sentenced the thief to three years in State Prison.

Judge Lawrence, in Supreme Court, Chambers, yesterday decided that it would be better for the creditors of the Guardian Savings Institution for Joseph J. O'Donohue, its present Receiver, to be removed from his position. He also ordered a reference to ex-Judge Bosworth to determine as to who would be a proper person to succeed O'Donohue.

Judge Van Vorst, in Supreme Court, Special Term, in the case of Pike against Seiter and others, held, yesterday, that where a man purchases real estate, and agrees to assume a mortgage on the same, but has the deed made out to his wife, who does not assume the payment of the mortgage, he is liable for any deficiency arising from a sale of the mortgaged premises.

Suit was yesterday begun in the United States Circuit Court by the Republic of France against the Phœnix Insurance Company of this City, to recover the sum of $4,756 29 on a policy for $10,000 taken out in 1871 on a cargo of beef shipped from this port on the steam-ship Zoe, which was wrecked during the passage. Messrs. Dickerson and Beaman appear for the French Government.

Morris Weinberg was arrested on Aug. 30, 1873, on a civil suit, wherein he was charged with misrepresenting the pecuniary responsibility of a man who had applied to one William M. Carpenter for goods on credit and had referred the latter to Weinberg. By writ of habeas corpus Weinberg sought to be admitted to bail yesterday, but Judge Barrett, in Supreme Court, Chambers, adjourned the hearing until to-day.

Another adjournment was obtained in the Pearsall will case yesterday afternoon by counsel for Elisa Jane Pearsall, who is contesting with the testator's widow for his property, valued at $100,000. The plea was that new evidence would be introduced in place of that of William Korff, who swore that he drew the will giving the property to Elisa Jane. His testimony was stricken out on the ground that he had been convicted of perjury.

Thomas Kreusly, a German, aged 50, who keeps a grocery store at No. 183 South Fifth avenue, was arraigned before Justice Otterbourg at the Washington Place Police Court yesterday, charged with having committed an outrageous assault upon the person of Maria Theresa Kinghead, a half-witted child 11 years of age, who resides in the same house. The details of the assault are unfit for publication. The accused was held to bail in $1,000 for trial.

Robert J. Livingston sued Alonzo B. Cornell and others, who were Trustees of the Neo Silicon Steel Company, to recover from them a debt due by the corporation, on the ground that they were personally liable because they had failed to file the annual report of the company for 1874 within 20 days after Jan. 1, 1875. Judge Donohue, in Part I. of the Supreme Court, held yesterday that the statute must be strictly complied with if Trustees of corporations desired to avail themselves of its benefits. A verdict was given for $1,415 56 in favor of the plaintiff.

The suit of Blanchard Fosgate, Jr., against Owen O'Connor was brought to trial before Judge Joseph F. Daly, in Part III. of the Court of Common Pleas, yesterday. The action is to recover $1,000 for architect's fees in altering the building Nos. 6 and 7 Chatham square, in February, 1876. The answer is that the plaintiff agreed to do the work without receiving any other pay than a lease of the premises at $7,500 per year, with the privilege of reletting them at a higher price. The plaintiff claims, however, that O'Connor got the lease back by offering to pay $1,000 for it, but failed to pay the money. The case is still on.

Application was made to Judge Robinson, in the Special Term of the Court of Common Pleas, yesterday, to have a pauper lunatic sent to the Middletown Asylum for the Insane. In opposition to this it was said that at this asylum the lunatic's board would cost about 60 cents per day, whereas he could be boarded at the Ward's Island Asylum for 24 cents per day. Judge Robinson said that in the present condition of affairs he was opposed to put any additional burden upon the taxpayers of the City, and he therefore ordered the lunatic to be sent to the Ward's Island Asylum.

AN OLD BURGLAR SENTENCED.

Two years ago a notorious burglar named John L. Bough was convicted before Judge Sutherland of burglary in the first degree, and sentenced to 12 years in State Prison. The case was appealed by Assemblyman Peter Mitchell, who succeeded in obtaining a reversal of the conviction, and Bough was released from State Prison to prey upon the community. The lesson taught him in Sing Sing seemed to have no effect upon the liberated burglar, who immediately returned to his old avocations. On the night of the 5th of January, he was detected in the act of committing a burglary on the premises of Jacob Richardson, No. 398 Third avenue, and taken to the station-house. When called up for trial in Part I. of the Court of General Sessions yesterday, Bough, who now spells his name "Bow," pleaded guilty to an attempt at burglary, and Recorder Hackett sentenced him to two years in State Prison.

A SUIT FOR FALSE IMPRISONMENT.

A curious suit for alleged false imprisonment, brought by August Ronnerberg against John McDermark and Frank Deno, was tried before Judge Lawrence and a jury in Part II of the Court of Common Pleas yesterday. Deno, it appears, is the foreman, and McDermark the watchman, of a slaughter-house in this City. On Sept. 5, 1876, Deno began to drink some water from a tank in the house and noticed that it had a peculiar and disagreeable taste. He spat out the mouthful he had taken and then handed the water to others to taste. Ronnerberg, who was at the place, was accused of having put muriatic acid into the water for the purpose of poisoning somebody. He was arrested, lent in jail for three or four days, and then released. He now sues to recover $500 for the false imprisonment. Deno claims that he did not cause Ronnerberg's arrest. The jury was out at the time of the closing of the court yesterday.

The Electoral Commission was in session about nine hours yesterday, but adjourned without reaching a decision on the points raised in regard to the method of testing the vote of Florida. An agreement was made, however, that a vote would be taken this afternoon, at 3 o'clock. Of course, all the speculations about the probable decision of the Commission are about equally worthless. That body may be trusted to keep its own counsel, and the depressed state of mind of Democrats in Washington is probably due to disappointment that so much deliberation should have been found necessary over a question which they professed to regard as easy of solution, rather than to any inkling of the drift of opinion in the Commission. It is suggested that some "middle course" may be found between the admission or exclusion of evidence touching the conduct of the Florida election, though it is exceedingly hard to guess how any such half-way decision can be possible on the merits of the case submitted to the Commission.

It is stated in a general press dispatch that a majority of the Commission will probably decide that, in addition to the Electoral certificates, no evidence will be received except such as relates to the action of the Florida State Government after the Presidential election. Should this decision cover the proceedings in the courts and the action of the Legislature subsequent to the 6th of December, it would, of course, require an examination of the quo warranto proceedings which resulted in the judgment of the 25th of January in favor of the Tilden Electors, as also of the legislation authorizing a new canvass of the Electoral vote at a date not sanctioned by the Constitution. But it is obvious that the decision would exclude all the "extrinsic" evidence whose admission was contended for by the Democrats in regard to the action of the Board of State Canvassers and the character of the returns rejected by them. But, as it was on these very returns that the decision of the court turned, and as their acceptance produced the emergency for which the Legislature provided, the Commission would, in the absence of evidence touching them, be compelled to confine its attention to the technical regularity of both the judicial and legislative action taken after the election. The exclusion of this evidence would then be a very substantial triumph for the Republicans, and would certainly justify the apprehension felt by Democrats in Washington that their only hope rests on their success in sustaining the course of Gov. GROVER and the ingenious CRONIN in Oregon.

The Assembly Committee on Cities have agreed to report favorably the bill enabling the Mayor to convene an Advisory Council for the purpose of devising a plan to be embodied in legislation for the more economical administration of the City Government. The bill has been amended so as to require a report from the commission by the 10th of March. As the bill can hardly pass the Assembly and Senate in less than a fortnight, and the Council could not, therefore, begin its sessions till near the end of February, there would be rather less than two weeks allowed in which to perfect a plan for which its advocates claim that the most careful deliberation and the most thorough examination of every pay-roll in the City would be needed. Gov. TILDEN'S Municipal Commission was appointed a year ago, and has not reported yet. Certain "eminent citizens" had a conference with the Mayor the other day, and merely exhibited their lack of knowledge of the questions they had come together to discuss. Were the Mayor and his colleagues in earnest on the subject of retrenchment, they could have held an Advisory Council without any legislation, and he would be a very sanguine person who should expect any practical result whatever from the perfectly well-meaning but essentially mischievous scheme embodied in Mr. COWDIN'S bill. If the Committee on Cities propose to make their report on the bill an excuse for doing nothing with the other City bills before them, it may be necessary to remind them somewhat forcibly of the dangers of trifling with a subject which seems to be rather large for them.

The Tammany Hall element at Albany is already raising the cry that the Legislature meddles too much with New-York City affairs, and that the proper policy is now to "let us alone." It is quite true that the Legislature has in the past interfered a good deal more with our local concerns than was good for the tax-payers, and that they are paying pretty dearly for that officious jobbery. But it happens that the mischief which has been done by bad legislation can only be repaired by good laws, and the people are not prepared to be cheated out of needed relief by the demagogue's cry of non-interference. Extravagant salaries established by law must be cut down; unnecessary offices created by law must be abolished; enactments for the increase of the City debt must be repealed; the pruning-hook of legislative reform must sweep away, whenever it can reach it, the accumulated growth of long years of corruption in the City allied with venality at Albany. Let this Legislature do its work thoroughly, and there will be little need for intermeddling with New-York affairs by next session, and the cry that the City should be allowed to take care of itself can be raised with less suspicion of corrupt motives on the part of those who repeat it.

There was a dreadful suspicion that DANIEL MARCY, the Democratic candidate for Governor of New-Hampshire, would be suppressed, in consequence of the dissatisfaction of the young Democracy of that State. They threatened to bolt if a more progressive man were not put to the front. These little differences have been fixed up, and, after a lapse of several weeks, MARCY'S acceptance of the nomination is made public. The committee inform him that the present exigency is one which causes every patriotic heart to throb. MARCY replies that his heart throbs in unison, and that he has looked with anxiety for the resolutions of 38,000 Democratic voters of New-Hampshire. Having perused these, his heart has ceased to throb—that is to say, it has ceased to throb painfully, and MARCY is himself again. He thinks that the life of the Republic is not so much in danger as it was before he was nominated. MARCY gives ten thousand dollars for the campaign.

Some facts of interest regarding the condition of the Treasury and the feasibility of reaching and maintaining substantial resumption will be found in a Washington letter printed in another column. The statements regarding our foreign trade are put in a form which should make them clear to the most indifferent reader. It is frequently argued that the "balance of trade" is of no essential consequence with reference to the permanent state of our currency, and this is undoubtedly true as applied to long periods. But it can hardly be maintained that in our country, at the present time, the payment in merchandise of a portion of the large debt held against us abroad, is not a necessary step in the process leading to resumption. Whether its influence is more important directly or indirectly, it is unquestionably important. This payment amounted in the last calendar year to over $185,000,000, and the greater part of it was made during the latter half of the year.

SIGNS AND SOURCES OF WEAKNESS.

The dissatisfaction among Republicans, which is alluded to in Washington dispatches, is not wholly unexpected, and is certainly not unreasonable. They have good cause to complain of feebleness and uncertainty in the councils of the party, and of vacillation, amounting almost to cowardice, in the prosecution of its understood purposes. Their discontent, and the discontent of Republicans throughout the country, will not be lessened by a consideration of the forms in which this lack of moral strength is developed, and its possible consequences to the party and the Government.

The questions now awaiting settlement are vital. Some of them indirectly affect the foundations of the constitutional system, others directly relate to the control of the Government and the maintenance or overthrow of the substantial results of the war. Every section of the Democratic party appreciates the importance of the issues involved. If Mr. TILDEN'S political fortunes alone were concerned, the great body of the Democrats would care little. There is so little in the man or his methods which appeals to popular sympathy, that if nothing more than his candidacy were at stake the Democrats would trouble themselves very slightly about the pending contest. They are battling, not for Mr. TILDEN, but for Democratic supremacy, and they carry on the fight with an audacious energy which is everywhere apparent.

The man they placed in the Speaker's chair was just the man for the occasion. He is fettered by no restraints of courtesy, by no nice interpretation of the rules and usages of the House. Right or wrong, he never shrinks from anything required by his friends. He allows his chief subordinate to inflict upon witnesses, confined for contempt, insults and cruelties which no jailer would dare to visit upon convicted murderers. His appointments to committees show his aptitude in the choice of instruments. He understands the value of bullying as a feature in partisan warfare, and the experience before the committees since the session began proves how well he has, in this respect, served his party. Mr. FIELD'S performances as the manager of the committee which Mr. KNOTT was once supposed to lead, are worthy of the Tombs Police Court. He insists that witnesses shall adopt words which he puts into their mouths, and threatens them with the terrors of RANDALL and the Sergeant at Arms if they refuse. His evident aim is, not to get at the truth, but to insinuate statements which the uninitiated may mistake for evidence, and which may be elsewhere used for influencing opinion. Only one thing is more surprising than Mr. FIELD'S impudence, and that is the meekness with which the Republican members of the committee allow him to go on unchecked. While he outrages decency and right in his treatment of witnesses, and in the perversion of what he calls their "evidence," Republican committeemen look on patiently, as though they were jurors in BARNARD'S Court and FIELD were privileged to fight for thieves as of yore.

It is not a matter of reproach that Republicans have left to their adversaries a monopoly of the disgrace which these displays of partisanship entail. RANDALL'S stolid misuse of power, and FIELD'S shameless abuse of opportunities are not characteristics which we should wish to see engrafted upon the Republican policy. But the energy and daring evinced by the Democrats might have been advantageously copied by the Republican majority in the Senate. In the House, of course, the Republicans are to a certain extent powerless. They might, nevertheless, protest, and by protesting and resisting, in the committees and on the floor, vindicate the purposes and cultivate the spirit of their party. The Republican Senators have a larger responsibility. They might have been as aggressive in their sphere as the House majority are in theirs. Instead of this, they have contented themselves at almost every stage with a defensive attitude. They have brought forth explanations and little else, and even these have been so conducted that, as partisan agencies, they have been ineffective. The Tilden fraud in Oregon is a gem in its way. It is at once so compact and so transparent that moderate skill would make it invaluable as an illustration of the means employed by the model reformer to win his election. The Mississippi investigation, again, suggestive as it is, seems to languish. It excites feeble and spasmodic interest simply because the conditions of popular effect are overlooked. The most striking illustration of short-sightedness and apathy, however, is in the inattention shown by the Republican Senators to the Democratic conduct of the campaign. Ordinarily speaking, the discussion of the arts of a canvass closes with the canvass itself. The Democrats have chosen to establish a precedent for a different course. They have tried—vainly, it is true—to detect wrong in the acts of the Republican managers. The attempt was a challenge which Republicans in the Senate should have promptly accepted. The opportunity was exceptionally good. Never was there a canvass so tainted with corruption and fraud as that directed by Mr. TILDEN, and for which he supplied the money. There would have been no more impropriety in investigating Mr. TILDEN'S bank accounts than in looking into Mr. CHANDLER'S, while the result would have been to tear the mask off a great hypocrite, and to fix indelibly upon the Democratic Party the infamy which the acceptance of his plans carried with it.

The weakness on the part of the Republicans, which the inactivity of the majority in the Senate reveals, is still further exemplified in the blind bargain which underlies the Electoral Commission. Great sacrifices might have been pardoned had they been reciprocal. But the Republicans gave up everything and got nothing. The Senators who undertook to speak in their behalf covenanted to accept the verdict of the Commission, whatever it may be. The Democrats, on the other hand, have gone into the court with their hands untied, and with a declared determination to contest the verdict if it be not to their liking. "Unless Mr. TILDEN be declared elected," assert the Democratic newspapers, "he will avail himself of the constitutional right of appeal, and we shall have the greatest lawsuit of this generation." In view of the same contingency, the well-informed Washington correspondent of the Sun remarks that the Democrats will probably "seek by some sort of tactics to get things in a shape where the House can decide that there has been no election, and then proceed to elect Mr. TILDEN." To say, then, that the conditions of the two parties are unequal, is very imperfectly to state the position. So far as the Commission is concerned, the Republicans have been out-manœuvred by the Democrats, and the circumstance has been made possible by the blundering haste of certain Republican leaders and the want of unity and vigor in the party in Congress.

The time is coming when, for the sake of the Republican Party, it will be necessary to analyze the causes of this discreditable state of things, and the relative responsibility of those to whom it is attributable. Meanwhile, we are not required to look beneath the surface for evidence of the disappointments and jealousies which are the main sources of the dissensions that exist. There are, in truth, two classes of leaders; one intent upon upholding the integrity of the party, giving effect to its principles, and striving unselfishly for its success; the other, thinking only of itself, and not unwilling that the party shall suffer, if private griefs can be avenged. The consequences are apparent. Division is followed by disgust, and disgust by indifference. The consolatory fact is that these dissensions are concentrated in the Senate Chamber, and that the party out of doors has no sympathy with the spirit which for the moment jeopardizes its cherished interests.

THE SAVINGS BANKS.

We have now from Albany the figures for 1876 of twenty-six of the City savings banks, the few remaining not yet heard from being of comparatively small size, except the German and the Union Dime. The figures are not yet sufficiently complete for a detailed analysis of condition, which must be reserved for another time, but they enable us to ascertain the general movement of the banks. The following compares the condition of twenty-six banks, in several important particulars, the change not designated by a * being increase:

	Close of 1876.	Close of 1875.	Changes.
United States bonds	48,819,790	43,240,844	5,578,946
Assets	174,841,461	172,774,293	2 067,168
Liabilities	156,132,719	154,318,579	1,814,140
Surplus	18,708,742	18,455,714	253,028
Deposited during the year	61,918,833	66,830,991	*4,912,158
Average accounts	391	421	*30

This statement exhibits an increase in every item but three, and in two of these three a decrease is desirable. The holding of United States bonds increases, while that of mortgages declines; these changes are relative as well as absolute, the proportion of the former in assets rising about 3¾ per cent., and that of the latter falling about 7½ per cent., and the Government bonds now nearly equal the mortgages.

But it is in the movement between the banks and their dealers that the most instructive lessons at present appear. Of the 26 banks, 15 declined in assets during the past year, 11 declined in surplus, and 11 also lost more deposits than they received, but in only 5 of the 11 cases did the net decline in deposits occur in the same banks with the decline in surplus, thus, again, illustrating the fact that in savings-bank business a loss of deposits—whether from a panic or from other causes—is often the occasion of increasing surplus by the forfeiture of interest earned but not due. The deposits during the year fell off $4,912,168 as compared with 1875, but, on the other hand, the withdrawals increased only $742,727 over 1875, and there is some increase in the net deposits remaining. Of the 11 banks whose deposits are less than withdrawals—namely, the Franklin, Harlem, German of Morrisania, Six-penny, Teutonia, Eleventh Ward, Dry Dock, Citizens', Manhattan, Metropolitan, and North River—the six first-named had the same experience in 1875; none of the six is among the largest; but whether the fact indicates a declining condition of those institutions we do not stop to inquire. There is an apparent encouragement in the fact that the year's deposits exceed the withdrawals; but it is more apparent than real, for the amount deposited includes interest credited, and hence arises from earnings on investments, not (which is the significant item of proof as relates to the condition of the savings-bank class) the amounts of weekly earnings they have been able and willing to put by. For the three years preceding 1876 the actual deposits, interest credits, and withdrawals compare thus:

1873	81,857,091	9,683,558	90,715,320

This comparison includes all the banks of the City. We are unable as yet to separate, for the 26 under consideration, the interest credits from the actual deposits of the year; but the deposits and interest for the entire list are probably about $75,000,000, and the withdrawals about $71,000,000. The following table, covering all the City Banks for the ten years beginning with the close of 1867 and ending with that of 1875, may be interesting:
